LAKEVIEW, OREGON, JUNE 12 1902.

THE LAST TRIUMPH OF THE BOER

The South African war is over, and the British in their frenzy of delight have no time to think that the Boers, even in their hour of defeat, have won another victory. Never before has a beaten enemy gained such magnanimous terms from the British Empire. The flag of the Saxon conqueror, though blood-stained and tattered, waves triumphantly over the ruins of two little republics, yet Dutch stubbornness, combined with a courage that might have come from old Sparta, has, even in the act of this grim tragedy, given the world a lesson. Their country made a waste, their families scattered, the graves of former comrades thick on every hillside, and themselves facing death or its dread alternative, capture and exile, the Boers did not creep trembling to the feet of the conqueror. With the pride of the race whose ships once set London quaking as their guns boomed on the Thames, they argued the settlement clause by clause, as though the war had been indecisive. They yielded some points, disputed others, and in the end gained more than they had hoped for, says the Bulletin.

Though the cause of democracy, as represented by republics, has sustained a defeat, the British Government has pledged itself that in the end it will grant the conquered territory a representative government. The Boers are to go back to their desolated farms, but the King's gold will start them again just where they left off when they took down the rifle and set themselves to the task of repelling the invader. Of course, all subjects of the late governments of the Republic of the Transvaal and the Orange Free State must acknowledge Edward VII as their lawful sovereign.

This is to be expected. Oom Paul Kruger, who has been safe in Holland for many months, may decline to take the oath and remain an exile, but grief at his plight will not be widespread even among the millions who have steadfastly maintained that the Boers were right. It is not Kruger who is the heroic figure of that great war. Mankind loves the man who stays on the firing line. For this reason, people prefer to think of brave Cronje, ringed by fire in the death-trap of a river bed; of Jaubert, dying before the land he loved had passed into England's keeping; of Delarey and De Wet, who like Marion and Sumter of the American Revolution, harried the enemy at every turn and eluded him at the very last.

One of the best of the terms granted the Boers is that which guarantees that no special tax will be imposed on the land to defray the expenses of the war. There were other desirable concessions, not so important as this one, and in only one thing did the Boers fail to gain protection for those who have just given the British Empire the fight of its life. The Cape rebels must pay a penalty for treason. Rank and file shall be disfranchised for life, and officials shall stand trial. Still, even the latter have a promise of mercy. Whatever is done to them, their lives are to be spared. The men of Cape Colony who rose to help their kindred risked all and lost. If they had triumphed they would have been patriots. Now they are rebels, defeated and disgraced.

To the Boers of the two republics go the glory of forcing one of the great nations of the earth to pour out its money in a wondrous flood, to send forth more men than it had ever before sent to battle, even when the mighty Napoleon threatened its supremacy. The Briton has triumphed, but when he sobers up after his spree of joy he may think of the bitterness of it all, and wonder if it was worth while. Still it does not matter what he thinks. The Boers will be to the modern world what the Spartans were to the ancient.

Let Eastern Oregon forever hold her peace. She had an opportunity to elect an Eastern Oregon man to the Governorship, and threw the chances away. Let her now quit "bellyaching" about not having proper recognition and representation. Lake county did her part, but there are other counties this side the Cascades that ought to go away back of the crowd and hide.
