

EASTERN OREGON.

An Era of Prosperity is Dawning
On Eastern Oregon--Crook
First to Feel the Change.

A new era is dawning for Eastern Oregon, an era of prosperity, of improvement and of settlement. Its vast areas now used for pasture are being located by the homeseeker, and the big ranges will soon be a thing of the past. Crook County, owing to its advantageous situation and easily controlled waters, is the first to feel the effect of the coming change.

Heretofore it has been looked upon as has the larger portion of Eastern Oregon, as fit only for grazing purposes. There never was a greater mistake. Its soil is of the best, and the deficient rainfall is all that prevented it being settled long ago. The irrigation projects now under way, and those contemplated, will supply this deficiency, and make it the greatest county in the state.

Few people realize the magnitude of Oregon. A few figures on Crook County will serve to convey some idea of it, and yet it is not nearly so large as either Malheur or Harney, and is at least equaled by Lake and Klamath, says the Portland Journal.

Crook contains in round numbers 10,000 square miles. It is eight times as large as the state of Rhode Island; four times as large as Delaware; double the state of Connecticut; larger than Massachusetts, New Jersey or Vermont and almost as large as Maryland. It had in 1900 a population of 3896, and at this date has probably about 4500. Massachusetts smaller by 1500 square miles, has a population of 2,846,670. Connecticut, half its size, has 900,000, while if the county were as densely populated as Rhode Island it would contain 3,500,000 people.

Clearly Crook County has not reached the limit in the line of population, and the vast area devoted to stock raising, and indeed, much of it devoted to nothing, indicates the wonderful advancement that may be permitted it. Its 6,400,000 acres of land have running over them, and supported principally by the natural pasture, 12,000 horses, 22,000 cattle and 180,000 sheep. This would give to each animal 30 acres. Clearly there is room for another cow or two and a few more sheep. Today each man, woman and child within its borders, has two sections of land to turn around in. There are 1,147 school children, and if this county was evenly settled, it would have one child of school age for every nine sections, or four to the township. With an average of 33 pupils to the school district, it would be 18 miles square. The ditches present under way from the Deschutes and Crooked Rivers, will put water upon 325,000 acres of as fine land as there is in the state, and land too, that at present is practically unproductive.

There are ideal lands for alfalfa growing, and that will be the principal crop grown on them, though it is not improbable that a large tract will be devoted to raising sugar beets. Crook County contains probably one eighth of the semi-arid lands of the state, and when it is remembered that Harney, Lake, Klamath and Malheur are even more sparsely settled than Crook, and each with no large or a larger area of irrigable lands, one can get an idea of the possibilities the future holds for this vast region. Besides the possibilities in the agricultural line, it also has one of the largest, and what promises to be, one of the richest mining sections in the world. This lies largely in Baker, Harney and Union Counties, but Crook County also makes a fine showing in the Oregon King and other mines at Ashwood, while the Ochoco mines also give promise of permanency and large values.

Crook County is certainly great in her resources and will be "Greater Crook" when all her resources are fully developed. Crook is one of Eastern Oregon's splendid possessions. Lake County however, appears obscure in the Journal's editorial. Possibly because Lake has never trumpeted her great achievements (if she has made any,) or for the reason that her citizens have been content to let her "win her way as best she may." A spirit of enterprise in developing resources and making them known to the world has been a failing of our county's people—an apathy that needs rejuvenating.

Here is Lakeview, the capital of Lake, central point for business covering a territory of 50 to 100 miles in every direction—a growing city only by reason of its location—built up and sustained by the stock and farming interests, the queen city of South Eastern Oregon; Paisley to the north with its magnificent contiguous valley of the Chewaucan; Warner Valley, one of the greatest of our valleys for stock raising, to the east of us, and New Pine Creek, in the center of the great Goose Lake valley, a town with many rich possibilities and to be made important with the advent of a railroad from the south. Lake county remains too much in obscurity.

She is the peer if not superior to any big County east of the Cascades. Irrigation by public expenditure and a little more enterprise by our citizens, with the resources we now have in cattle, wool, sheep and horses, will give this territory a name that will be known the world over.
