In giving a young man who was before his court on a proven charge of robbery a term of four years in the penitentiary, Judge McBride added some good advice directed to young men in general. There should be no jail sentences for crimes of this character. When a young man enters upon a career of robbery or any kind of hold-up device to get a living off the earnings of another who is willing to work and has earned something, his days of usefulness are over before having begun. Examples should be made of every failure of this character. Each apparent success but stimulates others along the same pathway, and the numbers of loafers and hangers-on are increased. Idleness resulting from a general disinclination to work for a living, is the first step. Idleness is the first thing to be shunned. Few men can afford it. Certainly no young man can. The performance of honest labor never got an ybody into the penitentiary.
