The young apples are falling from many of the trees about town. Examination shows no defect except that the end of the stem which joined the apple to the tree is of unhealthy appearance, being dark. This indicates that the late frost, while not sufficient to kill the life germ in the bloom, yet so damaged the stem as to render it incapable of supporting the increased weight of the growing fruit. We should be glad to hear from orchardists throughout the county whether this injury is general or not.
