PEASANT AND THE TRAVELER

The Hare and the Wolf Who Had Broken His Leg—How a Bull Showed His Appreciation of His Master's Kindness.

[Copyright.]
One day as a Traveler came along to the cottage of a Peasant and asked that he might sit down and rest awhile, he observed that his host was worried about something and finally asked the cause.
"It is that I have cut down some trees to make lumber of and can't decide the best way to get them to the sawmill," was the reply. "If you will step outdoor with me I will make it more plain to you. There is a creek down which I could float them, you see, if there was a bit more water, and here is a road by which I could haul them away if certain repairs were made. It is the dilemma that puzzles me."

"That needn't bother you an hour longer, good friend," replied the Traveler. "I observe that the stream comes from a lake. By a little digging you can get all the water you want. All things are as easy as rolling off a log when you once know how."

The Peasant blamed himself that he hadn't seen the way before and took his spade and began digging. There was but little earth to be removed before the water came gushing down the creek in a torrent, and the logs soon floated and were whirled on their way to the mill. A bland smile stole over the Peasant's face and rested there for a moment, and then he suddenly jumped up and down and exclaimed: "Alas, thou hast made a fool of me! The water is all running out of the lake, and my geese and ducks will now have no place to swim. If thou hadst passed on thy way without giving me advice, I should have been better off."

Moral.—"As to that, Uncle Rube," replied the other, "I did not shoot off my advice until it was asked for."

"Then why didn't you advise me to haul them out by the road?"
"For the simple reason that you might have broken your back in so doing. Your saw logs are now below the mill and will be lost to you, and all the water has drained from your lake, but the experience will be of value. Learn and remember that he who asks for advice has reached that point where he is ready to make an ass of himself on somebody else's say so."

The Hare and the Wolf.

One day in making her way through the forest the Hare came upon a Wolf with his leg broken and suffering great pain. The Wolf begged for assistance, and the Hare slowly approached and finally said:

"You have on various occasions sought to catch and devour me, but I cannot find it in my heart to leave you to suffer thus alone. I will do what I can for you."

"And you shall find me grateful for the same. The Lion, the Hyena and the Fox have passed me by without sympathy, and your kind words bring tears to my eyes. From this day on I eat no more Hares."

The Hare assisted the Wolf to his lair and did all possible for him under the circumstances. A few weeks later, when the patient was able to limp about, the Hare called to see how he progressed and was at once seized in his jaws.

"But how is this?" she demanded. "I thought you were to eat no more Hares?"
"You are correct. I have changed off to Rabbits."

"But it was I that assisted you in your distress."
"Yes, but I am about well now. A Wolf with a broken leg and a Wolf with four good legs under him are different animals."

"But you assured me that you would be eternally grateful," persisted the Hare.

"And I shall be. To give you a proof of it there stands the Fox ready to devour you. He will have to make at least four bites to kill you, while I can do it with one and save your suffering."

Moral.—It is sometimes better to incur one's enemy than to win his gratitude.

The Bull and His Master.

The owner of a fine Bull went into the field one day and saw to the animal:

"I think the bell on the spotted cow disturbs your ruminations, and I will therefore remove it."

"Yes; it does disturb my thoughts and thinks somewhat, and your action is kindness itself," replied the Bull.

"And I observe that a great many flies are lighting on you and making things uncomfortable. I will therefore cover you with a sheet."

"Thanks from the bottom of my heart."
"And those two tramps on the fence—their language must give you a pain, and I will drive them off."

"Yes; I have been painfully upset by their frankness of conversation. When I attend an aldermanic banquet, I expect to hear some pretty hot stories, but when it comes down to tramps I don't want to be there."

"Are you satisfied with the water in the creek? If not, I will order champagne."
"Oh, it's fairly good for water, and I will try and worry along."

"Would you like any of these trees moved so as to give you more shade?"
"Thanks, but I won't put you to that trouble."

"If the air here don't agree with you, just say the word, and I'll have it changed."
"It's only very common air, but"—

And the Bull made a dive for his Master and lifted him on his horns and tossed him over the fence.

"Alas, ungrateful animal, but you have broken a leg and three or four ribs for me!" exclaimed the Master in reproachful tones.

"You don't say! By George, I am more than sorry for that!"
"But why did you attack me after my kindness to you?"
"Attack? Why, I never thought of attacking you. Seeing a Grasshopper about to seize you in his talons, I tossed you over the fence to save your life and show my appreciation of your great kindness."

Moral.—It's a question whether one had better be seized by a Grasshopper or tossed by a Bull. M. QUAD.

The Logic of It.

"No news is good news," said the man who was expecting bad news and had heard nothing.

"That's where you are wrong," replied the consoling logician, "because if, as you say, 'No news is good news,' then if you had received good news it would have been bad news, for no news being good news, how could any news be other than bad?"

But the other man refused to be comforted.—Lippincott's.

Had His Sympathy.

"Yes," said Miss Jiltham, "he was an old flame of mine. And when you told him I was to be married next week did he seem sorry?"
"Yes, he admitted that he felt very sorry," replied Miss Gabbie.

"Did he, really?"
"Yes, although he said he didn't know your fiance personally."—Catholic Standard and Times.

Things That Had Helped Him.

Reporter—Senator, I have heard that you got your start in life by selling newspapers.

A Factor.

"How much will that steak cost?"
"Well," answered the marketman, "owing to the cost of paper that will depend very much on whether you want it wrapped up or not."—Boston Herald.

His First Catch.

She took Delia and learned the art of moving gracefully. The fashions turned, and then she learned to do embroidery.

All this is changed. As now arranged her task is worse than Greek. For she must strive at boarding five on seven plunks a week.—Steppe Column in New York Sun.
