when the wheels may graze. Every driver knows almost positively just what his car can safely do on a dangerous turn. Having acquired that knowledge, a careful driver will hold his car to the minimum, for in case of a bursting tire he would be able to retain control of the machine.

"Strength counts for very little in a driver, but rather nerves, quickness and endurance. Speed in a car frequently may avert an accident, as the driver, having his car at its highest speed, seems to be almost able to lift the front of the machine and place it away from danger. To hesitate even for the fraction of a second at such a crisis might mean death."
