ROOSEVELT IN AFRICA
A Trip to the Big Game Country
By Frederick R. Toombs

THEODORE ROOSEVELT has never been accused of doing things on a small scale, and when he announced his intention of traveling over 9,000 miles to risk his life in African jungle shooting no one was surprised. Such a resolve, coming from him, actually seemed commonplace, and on his return, if he escapes alive from the deadly dangers confronting him, he will no doubt be well able to describe realistically the similarity or difference between gunning for trust octopi in Washington and forest behemoths along the equator.

most accurate and the most effective prints possible, and handicapped by the bulk of his camera, he cannot possibly carry a gun in any position to be of speedy use in the many emergencies that may arise. Dr. Edgar Alexander Mearns, U. S. A., as chief naturalist, assisted by Edmund Heller, the twenty-six-year-old Riverside (Cal.) explorer, hopes to discover hitherto unknown specimens of both animal and vegetable life. Professor J. A. Loring, as field naturalist, completes the scientific department. On entering the limitless wilds of the dark continent the party will be recruited up to from 200 to 450 men.

laws of death yawning and oncoming two or three seconds away. The recoil of this gun is utilized scientifically to eject the spent shell, cock the rifle and simultaneously reload it.

A more varied itinerary for a vacation trip than Mr. Roosevelt's is rarely seen—New York to Naples, the Mediterranean route, the steamers following which stop at the Azores and Gibraltar; then a two day run along the shores of Spain, passing close to the Balearic Islands of Ibiza, Minorca, Majorca and later historic Sardinia; then open water northeastward to the vine covered slopes of Capri, from whose lofty heights for years the notorious Tyrrhenian pirate chiefs spied and swooped down upon the richly laden craft plying to and from the neighboring bay of Naples.

Changing at Naples in a few hours from the North German Lloyd steamer to one of the German East African company, the 1,500 mile stant past the sulphur cliffs of Sicily and across the Mediterranean to Alexandria will further interest the notable American party. In four days they will be ashore in the land of the Ptolemies, the Egyptian land of mystery, the land that was old when ancient Rome was new. But the one time city of Alexandria the Great, Pompey's pillar and the Pharos light must swiftly pass, as also the interesting Nile delta, dingy, dirty, degenerate Port Said and the Suez canal, for southward and eastward the course of Mr. Roosevelt's empire takes its way—down the Red sea, south through the strait of Babel-Mandeb, Arabia in view on the left, Abyssinia on the right—eastward again through the gulf of Aden. Those dark, hazy heights on the south shore are the Ingaill mountains of British Somaliland.

Now comes another shift of the course—southward around the hidden rock ribs of Ras Abuh and the treacherous Cape Guardafui, on Somaliland, where full many a gallant ship and her gallant crew have disappeared. On rounding the curve the waters of the typhoon swept Indian ocean spread on every side. It is now a south and a south by west run of 1,500 miles to one of the preliminary objective points of the expedition, Mombasa, the romance clustered capital of the protectorate of British East Africa, a total of about seventeen days from Naples. It is in Kilindini harbor that the party disembarks, the port nearest Mombasa, the medieval seaport fortified in 1530 by the Portuguese.

Mombasa, on the coral island, connected with the mainland by a bridge, is the terminus of the celebrated Uganda railway, built by the British government at a cost of $24,000,000 to tap and develop the vast and richly productive East African protectorate.

Loading their immense bulk of supplies and equipment on a specially arranged train and obtaining a part of their retinue of native helpers required in the wilderness, members of the Roosevelt party will now tangle with excitement, for the magic door of the big game treasure house is swinging open.

Port Florence, 584 miles to the west by north, on Lake Victoria Nyanza, becomes the second preliminary objective point, for it is there that the railway ends, and a steamer takes the party across the majestic queen of the African lakes to the very heart of the big game hunting region, to Uganda, on the plateau of which country the principal hunting is to be done. But there is much to do before reaching trip. Rising from the unwholesome coast, the train reaches an altitude of over 7,000 feet, crossing valleys and winding around mountain peaks, affording rarest views of great heights and sweeps of country. At Londiani the road is 7,400 feet above sea level. An inspiring view of Mount Kilimanjaro, about 19,000 feet high is revealed, its lofty top crowned with everlasting snows despite its closeness to the equator distant only three degrees northward.

Port Florence, for en route along the railway is the Nairobi district, where Mr. Roosevelt gets his first shot at elephants, lions, hippos and rhinos on the 50,000 acres of William McMillan, nephew of the late United States Senator McMillan of Michigan.
