and trading posts from the St. Lawrence to the mouth of the Mississippi, completely bemming in the thirteen colonies on the west. Governor Dinwiddle of Virginia resolved to send a message of protest to the French commander, St. Pierre, who was stationed at Erie, Pa. The choice of a man to bear this message was one requiring great care, for the trip involved the traversing of several hundred miles of trackless wilderness, full of hostile savages, in dead of winter and called for prudence and diplomacy as well as courage. Dinwiddie selected a big. rawboned Virginia lad, barely twentyone, by trade a surveyor. The boy was George Washington. It was his first appearance in history. He made the perilous journey and brought back St. Pierre's inscient refusal to cease fortifying the disputed land.

A party of Virginian's started to erect an English fort at the junction of the abels and Allechens Thorntons rivers, or the present site of Pittsbure ! more at work on it at a feed and deis the place and proceeded to complete the fort on their Frenchmen and to name it Duquesne in honor of their commander in chief. Smarting at this bumillation, Virginia Meadows May 28, 1754, but were beaten and their eader, Jumonille, killed. This vas the first low of the war. The Virginians were continuing their march when Colonel Fry died.

The British government now took an active hand in the war. General Edward Braddock. with several regiments of "regulars," was sent across to America to take supreme command few bands of savages and a few bundred French emigrants do, he asked scornfully, to check the triumphant march of his British majesty's regular troops? Washington and others tried to point out to him the dangers that lurked in the forests of Pennsylvania and the difficulty of dislodging the French and Indians from their chain of forts. But he anubbed the "proviscials," scorned their advice and in 1755 set out with a body of 1,000 men to capture Fort Duquesue from the allied forces. Though the forest swarmed with Indians, Braddock used no caution and would not even send out scouts. With trumpets blaring and with no attempt at secrecy, he marched on toward Duquesne and-death. Early in July he had arrived in the near vicinity of the fort. Washington begged him to take great precautions in his advance, but Braddock refused to listen. Suddenly on the morning of July 9, as they were but ten miles from their goal, the rocks and trees on either side of the hill the little army too climbing burst into a yelone of alle shot and whizzing arand blundered straight rranged French and
