Uncle Sam Protects Forests by the Aid of Many Telephones

Most prominent among the measures which Uncle Sam has taken to protect his national forest in the west from heavy fire is the extended use of the telephone. This handy little instrument has proved its worth during the past year. According to figures which have just been published by the Department of Agriculture, the loss from fire has been greatly reduced, although the number of conflagrations has been actually larger than in the year preceding.

Through the aid of the telephone assistance is brought to the spot as soon as a blaze is discovered. In this way it is possible to prevent the spread of fire and to confine it to small areas. In one instance last year a fire-fighting force was collected in a few hours where at least a day would have been wasted if aid had been sought by means of a courier.

The number of fires in the national forests last year was 410 larger than in 1908, but almost 80 per cent. of the fires were extinguished before as much as five acres had been damaged. The fires covered less than one and one-half acres to the square mile of national forest land, and the damage done to the burned-over area averages but $1.25 an acre.

According to the government's figures, during 1909 there were 3,138 fires in the national domain, burning over about 300,000 acres. In 1908 there has been 41,000 acres laid waste. Last year some 170,000,000 board feet of timber were consumed, as against 230,000,000 the previous year.

The loss of value of timber destroyed was less than $200,000. The loss the year before was about $450,000.

These figures seem to indicate that though the damage to the forest is still great, the fires are not so much of a scourge as formerly. With a view of still greater increasing the fire-fighting facilities, the work of extending the protective system into all parts of the national woodlands is being pursued this year. The telephone will play an important part in the measures that are to be taken to reduce still further the loss in the western forests.

In some sections the forest rangers are supplied with portable telephones, which they carry strapped to their backs and with which they can secure connection at any convenient point.
