maybe he might not be willin' to believe but it was portant that he ort to know it an' it had sompin to do with de corpses in the ice-box here. Sompin' bout not lettin' anybody round 'em but folkses he know'd I told him that was jest 'xactly what we was a aimin' to do anyways. That's when he said well it wasn't so portant that he know it tonight then but to tell him when he come in dis mornin' an' say he felt like he ort to hev told somebody long time ago."

Having delivered himself of his message, Ben began wieldin' his broom again without further concern. It was just another message to Ben. To us it was a further spur for the trip we were about to make.

The sun was high in the heavens when we drew up before the great stone gateway of Selwyn House. Under der the bright light of the day the sinister aspect of the great building gave way to a pale shadow of itself—a shadow that made the place only a lonely scene of neglected beauty.

The tall trees cast gentle shadows on the lush green grass. Their waving branches hid the architectural monstrosity, partially. The great leaves of the carved front doors stood unaccustomedly open. Diaron sat perched on one of the stone lions that guarded the entrance at the lowest step of the white flight of five that led to the broad front portico. As we turned in the long curving drive he rose and came toward us.

"Well, Diaron," I spoke before Al had a chance. "I happened to be with Mr Jarton when he got your message and as I wanted to have another
