Miss Williams takes the numbers of the letters in your name, and does remarkable things with them, all of which however is apart from the story that her handwriting tells. Here we have a remarkable imagina-tion. There is keen wit, and a mentality that is alive to outside internew things, new ideas, new impressions.

This writing shows a strong strain of literary talent; sufficient it seems to provide a reason to think that Miss Williams could easily become a capable fiction writer. She thinks rapidly. She is practical rather than visionary. She uses her head rather than letting her heart influence her too greatly.
