CONJURED BY PASSION

The Story of a Young Methodist Preacher for whom a Siren Spread Her Net

"We could go to New York and live as man and wife," she said.

He was a Young Minister and the Pastor of the Largest A. M. E. Church in the District. The next Conference was to Make him a Presiding Elder and his way led to the Bishopric.

By Edward Worthly

As the young Rev. Creighton Hale, pastor of the St. Paul A.M.E. Church ushered his trustee-board member, Tom Strother, into his study, he could divine from the serious expression upon his face, that he had come to him on a mission of importance. He never had exactly liked his trustee, and he had felt that Strother did not like him. There had been some differences of opinions pertaining to church affairs between them.

Trustee Strother cleared his throat and said: "There has been talk."

"Talk—about what?" the young minister asked.

"It has been said that you have been seen leaving the house of this woman, Lulline Thomas, rather late at night, and knowing what kind of woman she is, it has naturally caused comment," he said bluntly.

This was like a slap in the face to the young minister—brought into question by a man who didn't like him. He could imagine the man inwardly gloating at his discomfiture. "You mean—you mean," he stammered, "that they have questioned my integrity?"

Trustee Strother's eyes never wavered from his. "Yes," he said, "it amounts to that."

After Trustee Strother had left him alone, he paced the floor of his study in resentful impatience. It was brought to him forcibly just how circumscribed is the life of a minister.

His thoughts were interrupted by the entrance of his grandmother, Martha Hale. Her face was lined which told of the former lean years as the wife of a struggling young minister—his grandfather, John Hale. She was outspoken in her denunciation of what she thought was wrong, but she had a heart of gold.

"What did the trustee come to see you about?" she asked.

"Oh, nothing much," he parried, attempting a smile that made his handsome face look sickly.

"He came to see you about that Thomas woman, didn't he?" she asked him as her eyes searched his.

His face flamed indignantly. Had she eavesdropped? And then he felt ashamed that he should think any such thing of his grandmother. Of course, it was just another of her tirades of which she was famous.

"That woman just done confounded you," said Grandma Hale heatedly.

The young minister regarded his grandmother with a frown, but she went on:

"Ever since that first day she came here with her pretense of wanting spiritual advice, I knew she would tear this house asunder. And now you have gone and got yourself tangled with that—hussy."

"Perhaps," said Creighton Hale, "she has made me realize how much I want my freedom."

"Freedom—from what?"

"From the ministry."

His grandmother looked at him in amazement, then she said: "As the pastor of St. Paul Church, you hold the largest charge of any man as young as you are. And it is a foregone conclusion that you will be made presiding elder at the next conference, and eventually; as next grandfather and I have hoped and prayed, a bishop. That was your ambition. Even your father was a minister."

"That's just it," he said irritably, "because my father was a minister and grandfather is a minister, it was just taken for granted, by you and grandfather, after my mother and father died, that I wanted to study for the ministry. I felt that I owed you and grandfather something and I did not go against your wishes in choosing my life work."
