

Stage Career Can't Kill Romance in Her Life

And She is the Girl

Dancing Team Just a Couple of Kids but they Have Own Philosophy of Life

CAROL'S CODE

If you want to be happy contented and successful though married, Carol Chilton says:

"Try to get a complete understanding of your mate, study his temperament, his likes and dislikes, work always toward pleasing him.

"Spend as much time together as possible, learn to cultivate mutual pleasures.

"Respect your husband's authority in matters of finance if he has business acumen. The outside interests of family should be entrusted to him—it satisfies his pride and keeps things running smoothly."

MACEO'S CODE

"Always give your wife the last word."

THEY BOTH BELIEVE:

That—punctuality and dependability are the paramount rules to observe to win success in the show business.

That—hard work and constant striving to improve their act is responsible for their success.

That—their devotion to each other while on the road, their courteous treatment without over-familiarity with the performers of the other race is the reason they have no trouble being spotted in all white productions.

That—some day after they get a lot of money they are going to settle down and have a home.

That—the success of each lies in sticking together through thick and thin.

That—they love each other very, very much.

CAROL CHILTON

who after four long years of rugged stage life still thinks romance is the biggest thing in a little girl's life when you've got the boy you love.

"Please," said Maceo to his little wife, "don't tell him that old story about how we met and how I followed you around until you married me; it's been told so often."

Carol puckered her pretty lips in just a bit of a pout. "I like to tell that part," she said. "I think it is the most beautiful part of our lives and besides, it's true."

His Inspiration

Of course, I knew the story only too well. How little Carol, a Chicago lass, fresh from a school of aesthetic dancing, came tripping the light-fanciful toe behind the footlights of a Cleveland theatre and a lad named Maceo, the son of a prominent Cleveland physician, saw her and immediately lost his interest in the languages and sciences and whatever desire he might have had to follow in the footsteps of his illustrious father.

A Little Bit of Sunshine

Maceo doesn't want me to tell that part of the story. Carol likes it, because "Romance is of man's life a thing apart; 'tis woman's whole existence." There is only one part of her life that is more beautiful to her—memories she cherishes more. These are centered around those seven short months that little Maceo, Junior stayed with them. He came and then he went away. The sparkle in her eyes is accentuated as big glistening tears creep from the corners when she mentions that part of her life.

He Likes Bigger Things

Maceo prefers to talk about less romantic things—those big occasions like dancing before the king of England at the royal command.

Picture in your mind a boy, a very young boy, and a girl much younger, with crimson peach-bloom cheeks, a fluffy head and flashing mischievous eyes, the both of them looking for all the world like two high school kids who have slipped from under the watchful eye of a prissy chaperon, and you'll get an idea of what Chilton and Thomas looked like backstage at the Century Theatre where they headlined the bill last week. As they talk to you they look wistfully into each others eyes with that expression of mutual admiration that is slightly reminiscent of puppy love days, but it isn't puppy love at all.

Carol Chilton and Maceo Thomas are really Mr. and Mrs. Maceo Thomas and have been so merged for four years. But I almost forgot, they did not want me to mention that at all.
