Raymond Robinson, who gave up his position as yard foreman some time ago with the Iowa Lumber Company and went to Coles to work for a lumber company at that place, being offered his former position by the Iowa Lumber Company came back to Jacksonville Sunday and he is again in charge of the yard. Raymond is a steady, industrious young man and being thoroughly competent in his work he is never at a loss for a job.

Tuesday afternoon two young Englishmen passed through Jacksonville bound north each riding a horse and having their camp outfit on a pack mule. The boys, for they were only about 20 years old, from their language and dress were evidently of families of some standing back in Old England and they were out on a lark to see the world. They said they had come on their horses from San Francisco and were bound for the Sound. They seemed to be enjoying the novelty of their trip, but not like the average young English blood out to take in as much of the world as possible, the boys seem to give some heed to their expense account for one of them remarked that they were disappointed in finding no grass for their horses, "this blooming dry country is breaking us up you know in buying horse feed." In pioneer days travelers through this section of Oregon found plenty of grass for their stock but all the best grass land is now fenced and the little outside range is pastured close by loose stock, so travelers have to depend on feed from the farmers for their stock.
