Jacksonville Figs.

The residents of Jacksonville are able now to sit under their own vine and fig tree for both the grape vine and the fig tree grow here in the greatest luxuriousness and not a yard in town but what has a few vines and several fig trees. The fig, while a semitropical tree, stands the climate of Southern Oregon quite as well as it does in its native districts in the Southland and grows quite as thrifty as an apple or peach tree and it very seldom fails to bear fruit.

The fig is like the orange and the lemon in that it will have both fruit just forming and will have ripe fruit on the tree at the same time. The fig trees here always have three crops of young fruit the first forming early in the spring and the second in midsummer and the third in the early fall, but the last crop seldom gets ripe as they are so late that frosts kill them. To people from the North used to dry figs, the green fruit has a too sweet and slightly insipid taste to be relished, but after one gets accustomed to the flavor the green figs are considered far superior to the dried fruit.

The variety usually found in the yards of Jacksonville is the common Black California fig, but Mr. Britt in his yard has four varieties, the Black Adriatic, White Genoa, Celestial and the Smyrna. These varieties are all much finer than the common fig and they are fruiting quite as well. Should the use of figs become as popular as bananas and some of the other tropical fruits their growing could be made a big industry in Southern Oregon for the trees will grow on most any soil and are as prolific and regular bearers as are the peach and apricot trees.
