Presidential Election Features.

Especially interesting attaches to the presidential election of this year for the reason that it is the first to be held under the new apportionment. The last three contests were conducted under the apportionment of 1890. The electoral college then contained 447 votes, 224 being a majority. The new apportionment gives a total of 476 electors, 239 constituting a majority. No state shows a decrease in its apportionment. The increase is divided as follows: New York, Illinois and Texas, 3 each; Minnesota, New Jersey and Pennsylvania, 2 each; Arkansas, California, Colorado, Connecticut, Florida, Louisiana, Massachusetts, Mississippi, Missouri, North Carolina, North Dakota, Washington, Wisconsin and West Virginia, 1 each.

In the new electoral college New York comes first, with 39 votes; Pennsylvania second, with 34; Illinois third with 27; and Ohio fourth, with 23. Missouri and Texas have each 18; Massachusetts follows with 16; then Indiana with 15, and Michigan with 14; Georgia, Iowa, Kentucky and Wisconsin have 13 each; New Jersey, North Carolina, Tennessee and Virginia each foot up 12; Alabama and Minnesota have each 11; California, Kansas and Mississippi follow with 10. Arkansas, Louisiana and South Carolina 9; Maryland and Nebraska 8; Connecticut and West Virginia 7; Maine 6; Colorado, Florida and Washington 5; New Hampshire, Oregon, North Dakota and Vermont 4; Delaware, Idaho, Montana, Nevada, Utah and Wyoming 3.

In arriving at this apportionment each state is given as many electors as it has congressmen and senators. Thus a state with one congressman has three votes in the electoral college.

The change in the number of electors has no particular political bearing. In the old college the South, including Kentucky and Maryland, had 150; now it has 159. New York, New Jersey and Connecticut formerly had 52; at present they have 58. The total increase in the college is 29.

There is a probability of seven presidential tickets in the field, with a possibility of even more. The Socialists have already nominated Eugene V. Debs, and the Social Labor party also promises to nominate. The Republicans, Democrats and Prohibitionists will, of course, each have a ticket. The Populists, whose convention occurs at Springfield, Ill., on July 4, say that they will name a ticket. In addition, a convention is already called to place a negro candidate in the field. In case of a bolt from any of these conventions still another ticket is possible.

In case one of the minor parties should secure enough electoral votes to prevent any candidate receiving a majority of the college; the election would be thrown into the present house of representatives. In that event, each state has one vote, the majority of the congressmen from the state deciding for whom the vote shall be cast. In the same way the vice president would be chosen by the senate, voting by ballot.

The present house of representatives, before whom such a contested election would be thrown, stands 207 Republicans to 177 Democrats, with two or three vacancies. Voting by states, the result would be 29 Republican to 15 Democratic, the vote of Rhode Island being a tie. The present senate stands 57 Republicans and 33 Democrats.

It is interesting to note that in the makeup of the electoral college the four large states of New York, Pennsylvania, Illinois and Ohio have 113 votes, or two more than twenty-two of the smaller states.

Considerable speculation is heard as to the total of the popular vote. This will depend, of course, on the interest taken in the contest. In 1892 it was 12,059,351. In 1896 it sprang to the phenom-nal figures of 13,923,102, and in 1900 was 13,959,673. A similar average increase would put it well up to the 15,000,000 mark this year.
