It was difficult to hire competent or even incompetent help in Eden Center, and the commuters in that idyllic spot had learned resignation.

"James," said Mrs. Crawford, "I haven't seen anything of that man who was to mow our lawn. Where do you suppose he is? There, I believe that's he now over in Howe's orchard!"

"Is he standing?" inquired Mr. Crawford.

"Yes," said his wife, "he's standing under one of the big trees looking toward our house."

"That can't be the man," said Mr. Crawford. "He'd be sitting or lying down."—Youth's Companion.

Fitting Them For Society.

One morning William Clark, Sir Walter Scott's closest friend, found some of their intimate daily associates among the young counselors of the Scottish bar, all convulsed with laughter.

Guessing the cause, he complained that "Duns Scotus" had been forestalling him in a good story which he had told him privately the day before. He added, plaintively, that his friend had not only stolen it, but disguised it.

"Why," answered Scott, skilfully waiving the main charge, "this is always the way with the baronet. He is continually saying that I change his stories, whereas in fact I only put a cocked hat on their heads and stick a cane into their hands to make them fit for going into company."

"The conscience fund is a curious institution," said the stranger.

"Yes," answered Senator Sorghum, "and if all the money that belongs there could be collected the government would have enough to run without collecting any taxes for a long time."—Washington Star.

Fine soap scraps are sometimes put into an agate pan, covered with water and cooked slowly in a moderate oven for an hour or two to jelly. In a covered jar this is always in demand for washing delicate laces, embroideries and handkerchiefs which should never be rubbed in soap.

"Yes, I sleep in the garage now, and the chauffeur sleeps in the house."

"What's that for?"

"The chauffeur is troubled with insomnia, and the midnight rides he took in my car in order to pass away the time were altogether too expensive."—Cleveland Plain Dealer.
