Bargain With Death and Win All the Years You Can.

No one of us is so poor or so unworthy that he is not ready to bargain with death. Let the specter name his price and we give up our loves and our tobacco with equal promptness. He may have our fortunes and our homes, our pride and our achievements and aspirations—yes, even our eyes and ears—if he will but smile upon our prayers. Let him so command and we will abide in the wilderness, we will find comfort in husks, we will lie down with the beasts of the field. Better even a browsing Nebuchadnezzar than a moldering Hercules.

It is needless to tell us that death is an arch gaffer. We know with whom we are dealing, and we know, too, that he grins in his sleeve at our eagerness to delay the inevitable. What to him are ten more years or fifty years or fifty centuries? Had Sargon, the mighty ruler of the Babylonian world, secured a respite of 5,000 years he would even so have been in his grave for more than a century when Richard of England led the crusaders to the walls of Jerusalem.

An old legend tells us that when Methuselah was 500 years old an angel came to him and advised him to build a house instead of living in the open air, as he had been doing up to that time. The patriarch asked how much longer he had to live. "About 500 years," answered the angel. "Then," said Methuselah, "it is not worth while to build a house."

By this token Methuselah proved himself a pessimist. To Azrael a thousand years may be as yesterday, but it is not for us to follow the example of our antediluvian forefather and view existence through the eyes of death. Every moment added to our earthly tenure is regarded as that much gain. The monk Hildehelm, listening to God in the melody of a lute for a space of three minutes, found that in those three minutes 300 years had flown. And so to each of us life means always the possibility of joy and revelation unmeasured by time or space. Therefore let us bargain with death. True, he will claim us at last, but we shall have had the better of the bargain.—Lippincott's.
