A Gentleman of Leisure.

By Constance D'Arcy Mackay.
Copyrighted, 1908, by the Associated Literary Press.

It was said of him along the street on which he lived that Desmond Fitzgerald was as lazy as he was handsome. While his neighbors rose early and went to work Desmond idled about in the city parks, sitting on the benches and reading papers that brisker occupants had discarded. If this diversion failed he would stroll down Broadway, watching, with an eye keen for every detail of humor, the life that went on around him. Occasionally he procured a job and then gave it up as soon as he had acquired money enough to carry him through the next three weeks. And as his wants were small a few dollars lasted a long time. There was no one dependent on him, and that was the excuse he made to himself for being as shiftless a young fellow as could be found in a summer's day.

When the weather was warm he would loiter along the streets that bordered the water front, where the wind swept in fresh and cool and full of a tang of the sea. Here and there he met acquaintances loading drays and hauling crates. Perching in some convenient nook, Desmond would amuse himself for hours with comments on the season and the advisability of shirking labor whenever it was possible. It was on one of these occasions that he neared a dump where men on wagons and scows were actively disposing of the city's rubbish. There he espied Thomas Macdonough shoveling away for dear life and the lives of others, for Thomas had a wife and six children.

As Thomas passed to wipe the sweat from his brow Desmond strolled up. "How are you, Thomas, this fine day?" he asked sociably. "That must be hot work you're doing! Who'd think there was that much sash and old tin cans in New York?" Thomas' only answer was a grunt. He had no time for such aimless conversation as Desmond's. But the latter, not a whit disconcerted, sat on a barrel near by and watched the workers and beyond them the warehouses and wharfs and the forest of masts and smokestacks outlined against the radiant blue of the sky. Ferryboats passed in the distance. Tugs went busily to and fro and rocked the grimy coal barges with their swell. Presently a hundred bells and whistles proclaimed that it was noon, and Thomas dropped his shovel with a great breath and stretched himself.

"Why do you stop for such an insignificant thing as a midday meal?" queried Desmond amusedly, and then the words died on his lips at the sight of the girl who was bringing Thomas' dinner pail. She wore a pretty blue calico gown which gave a glimpse of her white throat. Her eyes were gray and frank as a child's. Brown hair curled softly around her forehead. "Here's your dinner, uncle," she said. "I brought you some sandwiches that I made myself and a bottle of iced tea that will do your heart good."

"You're a jewel, Kitty," said Thomas, "a jewel worth having!" So Desmond thought as he regarded her. "Will you not introduce me?" he urged, plucking at Thomas' sleeve. "Kitty, my dear," said Thomas, "let me make you acquainted with Mr. Desmond Fitzgerald, gentleman of leisure."

An adorable dimple showed in Kitty's cheek. "Uncle Thomas must always have his fun," she smiled. "Have you been working here long?" nodding toward the dump. "I don't work here at all," answered Desmond. "On the river, maybe," she hazarded. "Or building houses?" "No!—This guessing game was making Desmond most uncomfortable. "Oh, then, you're on the street cleaning force?" she laughed triumphantly. "Nonsense, Kitty!" her uncle interposed. "What's the good of all these questions? He's what I told you he was—a gentleman of leisure."

Humor and Philosophy

PERT PARAGRAPHS.

The trouble is when you make a fool of yourself you have to levy on your friends when you are forced to make up the price you have to pay for it.

Faithful is the touch of a friend as long as the response is satisfactory.

The lies that are told about you are not so very harmful unless they are true.

The only way to avoid having to take things as they come is to carefully see that they are satisfactorily prearranged.

Starch in your backbone is all right as long as you keep out of a thunder shower.

The reason why the consciences of some people do not trouble them is because they have none.

The ill nature of a person is simply unbearable when it comes in direct contact with your own.

It is well known that a rich father-in-law is much more easily offended than a poor one.
