A NEW STYLE OF "BLIND PIG."

"Prohibition doesn't prohibit," says the man who is engaged in doing all that he can to prevent it from prohibiting. And undoubtedly this claim is in part true. There are certainly instances in every prohibition community of liquor law violators. These law evaders are clever, so clever in fact that the moral is that they are so frequently brought to justice. A story told by Elen W. Sears of Lynn, Mass., regarding an experience in Maine serves to illustrate the difficulties in the way of the public prosecutor in anti-liquor territory. Mr. Sears said that one day while he was visiting in Maine a friend asked him if he would like a drink of beer. Mr. Sears was not averse, but he was somewhat surprised by the question. "Where will you get it?" he asked. "For answer the friend conducted Mr. Sears to a room that was without fixtures or furniture save only tables, several chairs and the usual gas jets. A man came forward and asked what the guests would have. Mr. Sears wondered where the liquor would come from and he watched the waiter or closely. The man picked up a glass and stepped to a gas jet. When he turned the stop a stream of amber poured into the glass. He filled two glasses from this unique apparatus. For two other men he drew glasses of ale from another gas jet and for a third customer he provided whiskey in a similar manner. As there were several gas jets that had not been opened, Mr. Sears was about to test the "blind pig" resource by ordering a cocktail when a man suddenly appeared at the door and gave a warning of the approach of a policeman. The waiter stepped quickly to a corner and pressed a button concealed in the wall. Then he went to the gas jets, turned them all on and drained them of the liquid that remained standing in the pipes and set down to await the arrival of the police. "The gas is off now," he said as Mr. Sears and his friend departed. Is it any wonder that prohibition does not always prohibit?

Showers of dust and soot and great clouds of smoke encountered far out at sea by incoming Atlantic liners give testimony of the very serious nature of the forest fires that have swept parts of this continent in the past few weeks. When we remember that the available supply of standing timber is only good for twenty years of conservative use, we have cause for national alarm. It is to be hoped that congress at the coming session will take steps to further protect the few trees that remain.

Mark Cabot and George Barnard of Aberdeen, Wash., are making preparations to go into the raising of mushrooms on an extensive scale and according to scientific methods. They are having a cellar constructed 22x18 feet and will have 26 beds in it. Soil and fertilizer to make these beds are now being carted, the floors will be double-planked and the walls and ceilings will be double. Coal oil stoves will be used for heat and a man will be employed to keep watch of the temperature day and night. The promoters hope to grow twelve pounds of mushrooms to each bed every five days and at the market price of 75 cents a pound, figure that they will make some money.

A Kansas City widow has sued the son of a rich man for $50,000, alleging breach of promise of marriage. Ralvo for heartburn comes high these days.

Jack McAuliffe, former lightweight champion prize fighter of the world, has sued a New York cigar manufacturer for $5000 damages because of great anxiety of mind, humiliation and mortification caused by the cigar man naming a brand cigar in his honor. The terms in the petition would indicate that he has smoked one of the cigars.

Boxes have been placed under the seats in a New York theater for the convenience of women who cannot leave their hats in the dressing room. From the size of some of the hat boxes in use at the present season we judge that it will be shortly necessary for that New York manager to put his entire floor on hinges and then announce that the first woman who gets there can use the contrivance.

President Roosevelt is a good shot, or he never aims without his eyeglasses. Nearly all the leading sports in the world have sent him aids to sight. It is said he has received in the last six or seven years as many as 200 pairs of spectacles, from the aristocratic cinema pinneux to the old fashioned green goggles and the smoked glass eye shades, from sympathetic opticians. He is rarely seen without his glasses. In fact, they seem to have grown upon his broad, rather short, and somewhat bulbous nose. Not even his fence-taking horse can shake them off. He always wears them shooting, a most unusual thing, and it is a matter of history that there isn't a quipper or better shot in America with a rifle. A Rough Rider once said: "The President, though almost blind without his glasses, is the greatest shot in the world, considering that handicap."

This is a little story of a dog's self-sacrifice. Thomas Jones, the owner of a ranch on San Juan island, Puget sound, lost a collie dog about one month ago and though he had searched everywhere, was not able to find trace of it. Recently he killed a sheep and tossed one of the bones to another collie that he kept on the place. The dog surprised its owner by picking up the bone and starting away with it. The animal would stop every few feet and look around as if inviting Mr. Jones to follow him. The owner's curiosity was aroused and he decided to ascertain where the dog was going. He followed the animal for a mile and saw it stop at the edge of an abandoned well. It dropped the bone into the water below. Mr. Jones approached the well, but could see nothing on the bottom. He obtained a ladder and, putting it into the well, descended. On the bottom, in about two inches of water, he found his missing collie. The animal was in good condition, though he had been lost for 24 days. Mr. Jones believes that the other dog had kept the dog in the well supplied with food during this time, and the bones found at the bottom in the water would seem to bear out this theory.

The hardest earned victory is the complete mastery of self.

Even a red necktie is not a sufficiently loud danger signal to serve as a warning to some women.
