NEW YORK WOMEN ARE PROVINCIAL IN DRESS.

There is no charge that a New Yorker—or any other American for that matter—dislikes quite so much as that of provincialism. Attack our ethics and our morals; call us cold, heartless, pleasure loving, vain—and we will smile complacently, but even whisper that we are the country cousins of the Londoner or the Parisienne—and you wound us at our most vulnerable point. There is no sneer that hits home quite so unerringly as the "We do these things so much better on the other side, don't you know" with which foreign visitors sometimes meet our strenuous efforts toward cosmopolitanism.

A single visit to one of our restaurants or theaters will convince you that the conventions of evening dress are either shockingly misunderstood or deliberately defied by the average woman of means and position. She wears a hat and a high-necked dinner gown—a costume as inappropriate for an evening affair as a bright red frock at a funeral.

Of course, I am speaking primarily of city life and of women who frequent our restaurants and theaters, and on them I cannot urge too strongly the value and importance of the demi-toilet for semi-formal wear.

I was very much interested, a short time ago, in hearing a discussion on the subject of evening dress among women of moderate means. The chief reason that was advanced for its general disregard—economy—did not seem convincing. An evening gown need not cost any more than any other kind of a dress, and if a woman grumbles at its limited usefulness there are all sorts of clever makeshifts of collars and chemises that will let an evening gown see the daylight.

No, the true reason is that the American woman is not accustomed to seeing the décolleté gown in public places; she has not been brought up to it. She feels self-conscious and ill at ease in evening dress at any but certain recognized functions. She ought to feel ill at ease and provincial in anything else. I hope the time will soon come that she will feel so. Not until she does will we outgrow the last of our gaucheries—the high-necked evening frock. January De Lineator.
