HAS REMARKABLE MEMORY.

The ordinary person would say a hard time if he tried to remember 3000 names, but that is what the man at the information desk in the Metropolitan building, New York City, does. He has it down so that he can tell you at a moment's notice just where any one of the 3000 employees in the building is at work. There are 3000 employees of the life insurance company centered in many departments and ranging from the office boys and typewriters to the president. Any one who wants to see a clerk or a bookkeeper, for instance, in business hours has to go to the information desk in the arcade and the person you want to see is sent for.

That is where the information man's big job comes in. All that it is necessary to do is to go to this bureau directory and say that you want to see John Brown, and the information man, without stopping to consult an index, immediately goes to the telephone, calls for the proper office and asks for John Brown. If there happen to be two John Browns in the 3000 employees, he knows it and will say: "Do you want to see the John Brown in the bookkeeping department?" He knows that among the 3000 at work about him—the population of a fair sized town, by the way—there are two John Browns and he knows where each is working. The man in a town of that size who had the names of all of its inhabitants down so fine that he knew the street number of each would probably be that town's chief advertiser.

Not content with storing away 3000 names in his mental store room this man remembers a few more. There are 2000 tenants now in the building outside of the company's employees. Occasionally the information man has to consult his card index if you ask for a typewriter in one of these other offices, but a lot of times he has these names on tip, too. "How do I do it?" he said the other day. "Well, I seem to have a hole inside my head for each name and when it once gets in there I remember it. When I get a new name I keep it in front of me several days and keep thinking of it. At the end of that time I have it where I want it. It is all practice, but it takes some years before you're expert at it."

The largest chimneys in the world are being installed in the tower of the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company's building at New York. The four chimneys weigh 1500, 2000, 2000 and 7000 pounds.

Though it is estimated that a gramme of radium contains energy equal to one horse power for fifteen days, it parts with it so slowly that it would take 15,000 years to exhaust itself.
