has been accomplished in promoting co-education was that, in so far as men and women have common abilities, common rights, and common aims, they may study and labor together; but, beyond the point of differentiation in the department of life which belongs pre-eminently and exclusively to women—the home and motherhood—no provision was made. So noticeable was this neglect in the education of women that the criticism was made that we are educating shop keepers and artisans—money makers of our daughters—instead of wives and mothers and home makers.

"To meet the needs of modern civilization the advantages of school training must be brought within the reach of all the people. As already indicated, the great masses, ninety per cent of whom are engaged in industrial occupations, have no school advantages beyond the elementary grades. If, therefore, any special preparation is to be given these people for the vocations which they are to follow in life, it must be provided in the common schools. If our school work is to prepare for life in the truest sense of the term, it must be re-directed and so modified that it will be in perfect harmony with the environment of the pupils, and give them the best possible preparation for success in life, whatever vocations may be contemplated.

"But the question arises as to whether it is practicable to provide for the industrial work in the common schools. Is there time for it? Will not the introduction of these new features tend to the subordination of the fundamental subjects? A careful examination, however, of the courses of study generally offered throughout the country leaves no doubt upon this question. In many of the schools much time is still being given to such work in arithmetic, for instance, as cube root, stocks and bonds, complex fractions, obsolete compound numbers, and other similar subjects. Much of the chronological material in history can be omitted without lessening the value of this subject. The work in geography and language also can be re-directed and so modified as to increase the utility value of these subjects. In fact, by eliminating the non-essentials—the obsolete, impractical, valueless material with which the school curricula are now encumbered—there will not only be ample time for all the vocational work desired, but the courses will thereby be enriched and made very much stronger in every way.

Furthermore, work in agriculture, mechanic arts and domestic science and art can be so systematized and correlated with the other subjects that the training it affords for discipline, or mind development, aside from its utility value, will be at least as great as that of any of the other subjects.

"To accomplish the desired result there must be a general change of attitude toward education. We must abandon the old ideal of an educational ladder to the college or university. We should hold out to the average boy less hope of his attaining to the governorship of his State or to the presidency of the United States. Greater importance should be attached to the development of an ambition to excel in the industrial occupations in which at least ninety-two per cent of the people must inevitably spend their lives.

"However, in correcting the mistakes of the past, the opposite extreme should be avoided. There will be a constant change from one vocation to another. The nation will continue to draw many of its greatest leaders from the country homes, from the laboring classes. Farmers' sons will not all remain on the farm. The modern school, therefore, must not be narrowly restricted. Its function is to meet the needs of all the people. It must be broad as well as specific. It must provide the work required in preparation, not only for efficient service in the industries, but also for intelligent citizenship in a free republic. While training for service we must also train for character. Never before has the call been so great for men and women of broad

"Finally, therefore, we shall not have attained the ideal in the development of our educational system until all the people, of both sexes, whether rich or poor, rural or urban, shall receive during their school years in the public schools, the best possible training in preparation for the vocations which they are to follow in life—broad, liberal and practical—insuring thereby not only the greatest economic efficiency, but also the highest standard of citizenship, the best type of manhood and of womanhood."
