CALLED ON THE CARPET

them in connection with the Cunningham claims. The official record teems with such proof, which is documentary, and does not rest on any one man's assertions.

Great sympathy is expressed for innocent men, if caught in this net. But that certain men sought to violate the law, that some of these men were high up in the business and social world, that the Guggenheim, Morgan and Standard Oil combine was striving in every possible way to procure complete control of Alaska's copper, coal, timber and railroad enterprises, besides already possessing absolute control of all lines of water transportation leading to Alaska, with local telephone, telegraph and lighterage concerns, remains no longer in question, and is a notorious truth here.

Added is the well-known fact that every political appointment for Alaska nowadays must have the O. K. of this combine's agents before it can get past its guardians.

Although there has been much excitement to date because of the Ballinger-Pinchot controversy, the ground has not been scratched. It seems inevitable that sensation will pile upon sensation within the coming ten days. The list of names of the Cunningham claimants is complete, and it is likely it will be available soon.

Beverly, Mass., Sept. 6.—Secretary of the Interior Ballinger visited President Taft today and explained his position in connection with the Cunningham coal land cases, on which the Glavis charges were made and which have been given publicity in connection with the Ballinger-Pinchot controversy.

It is believed that Chief Forester Pinchot will be asked to make a signed statement of his contentions in relation to charges made by him against the Ballinger administration. It is said that Taft will then take the data submitted by both officials, along with the Glavis charges, and will study them during his western trip.

NO AID FOR FIRE FIGHTERS

Government Has No Provision for Relief of Injured Men Who Fight Forest Fires.

What provision will the federal government make for maimed and crippled fire fighters? The question is before District Forester E. T. Allen. He has a man on hand who responded to the urgent appeal of forestry officials when a fire was raging in the Clispus forests of Washington, who is now crippled for perhaps life. No fund is on hand to take care of such unfortunate, so far as the district forester has learned, but he is making a determined effort to see that something is done to have the victim of public duty receive such aid as is necessary to restore his health or nurse him to the grave.

A fire broke out in the Clispus forests of Washington. The government officials called in all of the men they could secure to aid in fighting it. Among the number was Kelly Roberts of Vance, Wash., twenty-five years old and in vigorous health. While he and three other men were on the firing line a tree fell among them, fracturing Roberts' skull and injuring the other three to some extent. Roberts continues speechless and apparently unconscious, although he was hurt August 25th. No means are provided the district forester for the care of injured men, but Roberts has been taken to a hospital and an operation will be ordered to see if his head cannot be given some relief by this means. Then Mr. Allen will investigate to see if some arrangement cannot be devised for taking care of the injured man until he is well again.

This case illustrates a class that seems to demand public attention. Fighting forest fires is an urgent duty of citizenship in every forest community. Unless all of the people within reach respond to calls of the government officials or volunteer when a big conflagration starts near them, there is little hope of checking its progress. Such men as aid government officials in their work are paid day wages, but the pay is small, and no one consenting to fight fire does so for the compensation given. It is a case of responding to the call of duty as truly as the soldier sacrifices when he goes to the firing line. At times the danger in fighting forest fires is as great as in fighting fires in the large cities, but as the work is done in the solitudes it receives little attention.

Kelly Roberts' case offers an opportunity to test public sentiment and the spirit of the government. He has sustained serious injuries from which he may never recover. He is a comparatively poor man, and cannot afford, if he recovers, to lose the time or money that he will be out during sickness. Mr. Allen will do all in his power to see that the victim is properly recompensed, and, if possible, to have some rule formulated by means of which assurance is had for the safety of men who volunteer for this work in the future.—Portland Telegram.
