ARGUE QUESTION OF SOCIALISM

E. A. CANTRELL AND R. G. SMITH
DEBATE HERE

SPEAK TO APPRECIATIVE CROWDS

Each Presents His Side of the Question, But Neither Converts Many of His Opponent's Believers

The debates Saturday and Sunday evening at Camp Progress between E. A. Cantrell of Los Angeles and R. G. Smith of Grants Pass fully met the expectation of the crowds which filled the big tent on both occasions. The line of discussion was much the same on the two evenings. Mr. Cantrell opened by laying out the line of logical demonstration.

Socialism, he stated, is the collective ownership and democratic control of socially-used property. The socialist theory stands in the reasonable midst, between the ideas of anarchists, who recognize no government claims, and the communists, who see in the individual only an atom of the collectivity. The socialist fully emphasizes the individual life and good, and would give full play to the pursuit upon just and equal terms of individual interests. But he also sees the social organism, and understands that it has rights and claims, to ignore which disturbs the just balance of individual opportunities for successful activity.

In discussing the question Mr. Cantrell stated that there were three stages of social development, the religious, the political and the industrial. The third stage is the one now confronting us. In referring to the latter he said:

"We do not believe in common ownership of houses, equipages, furniture or any kind of personally used wealth. But the railroads, the great manufacturing and mining plants must be socially used, and therefore should be socially owned and operated. Public ownership of private property is an absurdity. Private ownership of public property is a crime."

Smith Answers Cantrell. Robert G. Smith, in reply, began by stating that he now heard a new definition of socialism. He had had long experience in discussing with socialists, and found it difficult to keep along with their changing views. They began by declaring all property to be robbery, and up till today the socialist platform as he read it demanded the public ownership of all means of production and distribution and all land. But whatever their words, they always propose to make an Eden on earth by legislative enactment which cannot be done.

Many who were at the debate Sunday night were of the opinion that Mr. Smith had the better of the argument.

The socialist encampment closed last night.
