BUSY SESSION OF COUNCIL TONIGHT

GAS FRANCHISE, PAVING REMONSTRANCE, CITY HALL BOND, GARBAGE SITE AND OTHER MATTERS ARE COMING UP

There will be "something doing every minute" at tonight's meeting of the city council, as there are a number of matters the present council wants to clean up before the newly elected councilmen step into office.

The ordinance providing for the special election on the city hall bond issue will come up for final passage, as will the ordinance regarding the garbage site. The gas company seeking a franchise will also present its application through Noland & Crane.

In addition to these some residents of Klamath avenue will file a remonstrance against paving that street. Other matters that have been "hanging fire" will also come up for final disposition.

STANDARD OIL LOSES THE FIGHT

The issues in the case were of such magnitude and the "resume" of facts expected to be proved by the government so voluminous, that the court appointed a master to take the testimony. Over two years was spent in this task. Witnesses were examined all over the country. Frank B. Kellogg was the government's attorney, and opposing him was Moritz Rosenthal, who was reputed to have been paid $1,000 for every day he appeared in court. There were four or five other legal assistants.

At the actual trial before the circuit court the trust was represented by John G. Johnson of Philadelphia and John G. Hilburn of New York, two of the greatest corporation lawyers in the country. Kellogg argued in behalf of the government.

On November 20, 1909, the court sustained practically every contention made by the government, adjudged the combine a trust in restraint of trade, and reading the Sherman law broadly, ordered the absolute dissolution of the combine. By its decree the "holding company," the Standard Oil of New Jersey, was enjoined from voting the shares of stock in any of the companies controlled by it, or from receiving any dividends therefrom.

From the decision the oil trust appealed, alleging sixty-six errors in the decree. Briefly there were that the court erred in compelling non-resident corporations and individuals to appear at St. Louis; in overruling the plea of the defendants that the court had no jurisdiction; in finding that the nineteen corporations absorbed by the Standard Oil of New Jersey in 1899 were then competitive;

IF ATKINSON HAS IT, IT'S IN STYLE

in finding that the seven individual defendants in the ten years prior to 1899 had acquired competing companies to suppress competition; that the subsidiary companies in the combine were entirely controlled by the parent corporation, and that an exchange of stock for an interest in a single corporation was illegal.

The case was first argued before the supreme court last spring. The highest tribunal then only included eight active members, because of Justice Moody's illness, and shortly after the arguments, only seven, through the death of Justice Brewer. Because this was not a full bench, the court ordered the cases re-submitted.

By the appointment of Governor Hughes of New York and later the selection of Justices Van Devanter and Lamar, and the naming of Justice White as chief justice, the bench was complete on January 9th, when the case was again argued. Kellogg again appeared for the government, with Attorney General Wickersham as his assistant. Milburn, Johnson and D. T. Watson of Pittsburgh argued for the defendant. The court broke all precedent in granting five whole days for arguments.

About $500,000,000 of capital is invested in the various companies which go to make up the combine.

The record in the case is full of instances where the giant power of the combination was used to force competitors to the wall. The trust carried on its business in sections where there was a prejudice against trust products through concerns which, although absolutely controlled by the Standard, advertised themselves as entirely independent. It received rebates from railroads, and it had a system of spying on the business of their competitors.
