hall having been refused by the court during the seven months of their incarceration, were brought to trial today in the superior court. Ettore and Giovannitti, both of New York, are organizers for the Industrial Workers of the World. They are charged with being accessories before the fact to the murder of Annie Lopez, the woman striker, shot during a clash between police and mill operatives in Lawrence, on Monday, January 27th. Caruso is charged with murder in the first degree in connection with the woman's death.

Because of the great importance of the case two justices were assigned to preside. They are John S. Quinn and Percy Hall. The district attorney of Essex county, Henry C. Atwill, was in charge of the prosecution. John P. S. Mahoney of Lawrence, represented Ettore and Giovannitti, and Geo. S. Moore of Los Angeles represented Caruso. They were aided in the defense by Attorney George E. Roemer, Jr., who acted as defense attorney for the scores of arrested Lawrence strikers.

Through arrangements decided upon weeks ago only relatives of the defendants, lawyers, state officials and newspaper men who had cards were admitted to the courtroom.

No trial of a labor leader in the United States, excepting the McNamara and the famous Moyer-Haywood-Pettibone trial in Idaho, has attracted such attention as today's. The history of the case dates back to the passage by the legislature of the law limiting the working week in industrial institutions to 54 hours. Mill owners and other big employes of labor throughout the state had fought the passage of such a law bitterly, and with every possible weapon. It was finally passed, however, to go into effect on January 1, 1913. For months prior to the first of the year organizers for Industrial Workers of the World had been quietly organizing the unskilled labor of Lawrence's mill system, which includes the American Woolen company. On the first payday after the 54-hour-a-week law had gone into effect, the men, women, boys and girls who had worked in the mill found that in every instance they had been docked two hours' pay. That night meetings of the various nationalities—there are some forty working in the Lawrence mills—were hurriedly called, and the word went forth to strike the next morning.

The workers went to their looms and spindles as usual. Suddenly, in every mill, before the wheels had made a complete revolution, the various leaders gave the signal, and the strike was on. Some violence attended the opening of the strike, and at the outset public opinion was unfavorable to "the foreigners," as they were called. The mill owners flatly refused to treat in any way with the strikers, declaring that there was no strike. However, within a week, 10,000 of Lawrence's 32,000 mill operatives were out, and Joseph Ettore and Alturo Giovannitti were sent from New York to take charge. Ettore's fiery addresses before huge mass meetings on the common aroused the workers, and the 10,000 grew to over 20,000 in a few days. Picket lines of from 5,000 to 12,000 men and women every morning at 4 and 5 o'clock formed about the mills and tramped back and forth in the snow and slush to persuade non-strikers to join the common cause and fight for better wages. It was then that city officials, acting for the mill officials, began the tactics which ended in a congressional investigation, following the clubbing of women and the tearing of their children from them while sending the little ones to be cared for in other cities to keep them from starving while the strike was on.

In the meantime state troops were sent down to "protect" property. The soldiers had not been on the scene a week before clashes between strikers and soldiers became frequent. A boy, John Rami, was stabbed in the back with a bayonet as he was running from a squad of militiamen whom he and several other boys had been jeering.

Then came the riot between soldiers and strikers in the downtown section of the town on Monday, January 27th. That morning a patrol of police had been stationed in front of one of the branch meeting places of the strikers. All day long scores of municipal and state police had clashed at this point. Toward 4 o'clock in the afternoon one of the many parades which the strikers occasionally held was broken up. A portion of the crowd turned toward the headquarters which had been the scene of trouble all day. Extra guards were rushed to the place, and a pitched battle in which shots were fired began. Annie Lopez, who was standing near the edge of the crowd with several other women, jerking at the police, fell to the ground, shot through the heart. Then the crowd dispersed. Caruso was arrested on the spot, and held the next morning without bail, charged with murdering the Lopez woman. Three days later Ettore and Giovannitti were backed up, charged with instigating the crime through their speeches and through literature. Three witnesses for the defense testified at the preliminary hearing before Police Court Judge Mahoney that they had positively seen a policeman shoot the Lopez woman. No witnesses except the policeman who arrested Caruso testified against the latter. Attorney George E. Roemer asked Judge Mahoney to fix bail. It was refused. An appeal was taken to the state supreme court in Boston, but although Roemer had the three witnesses swear they had seen the policeman shoot Annie Lopez, bail was again denied and the accused men have been in jail ever since.

of the warning, and continued to ply their vocations, apparently believing that they were immune from prosecution. The result was grand jury indictments and the subsequent arrests from Judge Benson that future convictions would mean jail terms with men charged with selling liquor to Indians, incest, child stealing and forgery.
