A canvass was made at high school to see how many had ever seen a football game, and it was discovered that only 30 per cent of the students had ever attended a match game, on the next tomorrow will be something of a surprise.

M. A. McCall in his talk made several points, namely: "That a game never really counts until it is over, and that it gives an impression of good or ugly, and lastly, it makes a man use his head. The sport seems to have remained lower since the introduction of such rough play."
