Frakes of the special venire were excused by the state, and the defense excused John Cox, C. M. Morrill and George J. Walton. Excused by the court was William P. Johnson. Following the selection and swearing in of the jury and the opening remarks by District Attorney John Irwin for the state and Horace M. Manning for the defense, a short recess was taken. The taking of testimony commenced at 2 o'clock. Harriett Fink, the 14-year-old girl Ferris is charged with spiriting away from home, was the first witness called. The court room was filled with a curious crowd, mostly men, when the girl, who is well matured for her years, took the stand for the state. The meeting of Ferris, as she and other young girls called at the aged carpenter's shop on Klamath avenue, his kindness to them and his occasional gifts of quarters and half dollars toward their amusement, were told by the girl, embarrassed under the concentrated stare of the throng. The departure of her friends, she said, left her alone, and she made visits by herself to the shop. The yearning of the young girl for the life in a city, for the chance to leave home and earn her own living surged in the heart of young Miss Fink at the time her companions left, she said in her testimony. During visits to the Ferris shop, the girl says she confided these desires to him. Ferris, she says, repeatedly offered to help her, and in July she accepted his offer. With money furnished by him she says she purchased a sweater, long skirt and other clothing, and these she packed in two suit cases fur-
