Cleveland Water Is Making Women Bald

United Press Service

CLEVELAND, O., Feb. 26.—Cleveland's fair sex today are in a genuine state of alarm, not to say panic, and rightly so, according to expert hair dressers.

They are due to become bald within five years, and all because of chemicals used in city water.

Startling changes already are declared to be noticeable since the use of the chemical, which water experts declare is imperative to the purity of the city water supply.

Gray-haired matrons are becoming blonde; women with brown hair find it turning to auburn, while auburn-haired women find their tresses becoming flaxen.

The whole change is the preliminary stage of baldness, expert hair-dressers declare.

"I find no other excuse for the alarming conditions and the noticeable change in color, but the water," declared Mme. Schaefer, foremost of Cleveland's hair experts. A score of other experts concurred.

Chief Two Guns White Calf on the Move

Chief Two Guns White Calf's tribe on the Blackfoot reservation, near the Glacier National Park in Montana, moved camp the other day. The photograph shows the chief's personal household en route. The two ponies at the rear of the line are engaged in hauling the "travois"—the oldest form of transportation on the North American continent, the canoe and the human leg being excepted. As soon as the Indian got the pony he began to haul his effects just as the Blackfeet in the picture. It was hundreds of years later before the screeching Red River cart became a rival of the travois. But it was brought to the Blackfoot country by the white men. The travois is the Indian's own invention. On the day this photograph was taken it was announced that men would try to fly across the sea. A trip by wing around the world was proposed. A crew of English seamen died in their submarine. Progress hasn't touched the Blackfoot. He prefers his travois.
