Bryan and Japanese Ambassador
Hold Many Conferences of Late

Daily conferences over the California anti-alien land bill and the Baker Asiatic exclusion bill now pending in congress, have been the order with Secretary of State William Jennings Bryan and Viscount Suteomi Chinda, the Japanese ambassador extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary.

It is understood that as a result of Bryan's statement that the rights of the state are supreme in such matters as the California legislation, the matter will be taken before the peace conference at The Hague for arbitration by the powers.

Some Sidelights From Vera Cruz

Interesting Little Tales of Incidents and Conditions at the Mexican Port Where the American Flag Is Waving

By WILLIAM G. SHEPHERD
(United Press Staff Correspondent)

VERA CRUZ, June 18.—(By mail, to New York)—How to keep your dignity. That seems to be the big problem in Vera Cruz these days. Some folks succeed and some don't. It's hard to hang onto your money because of Klondike prices. It's difficult to keep cool; it's even hard to keep clean. But to keep your dignity, there's the rub.

It is a problem that seems to bother the army and navy officials more than it does common everyday folks. Only the other day General Funston's dignity almost got away from him. He was trying to eat a meal under the sidewalk arcade surrounding the plaza, chatting meanwhile with one of his officers. The newsboys, bootblacks and souvenir sellers pestered him like flies, in Mexican style, and, after being interrupted a score of times the general suddenly arose, and sent after the flying Mexican urchins a kick that would have disabled a horse, had it struck him. "Advise postoffice department when ship leaves," was the message which Pooles sent to Captain Stickney of the navy.

Wow! That little message raised hob with Stickney. It seemed to hit him right square in his dignity. He wrote a letter back to the busy postoffice men.

"When you address me," he said, in effect, "kindly use courteous terms and place your matter in the form of a request, not an order." Then he signed his name and put all his titles after it.

The postoffice took the matter up with the admiral himself. "The navy is one branch of the government," they pointed out, "and the postoffice is another branch. We've got our orders in the postoffice department not to use titles and a lot of courteous words, but to make all our letters and telegrams as short and concise as possible. That's what we did to Stickney."

"You're right," ruled the admiral. And now the messages that Captain Stickney gets from the postoffice department are shorter than ever, with a lot of business in them, but not much balm for wounded dignity.

And there's a lieutenant who had run out, twice a day, to the gap in the railroad to pick up American refugees from Mexico City. These refugees were always footsore and tired and sick at heart, having left nearly all their possessions behind them in Mexico, and the first glimpse of the American flag on the train at the gap always thrilled them.

Some of them were inclined, in the joy of their spirits, to give three cheers for the flag and slap every soldier and officer on the back, and call them "good boys." It was only natural, but the lieutenant couldn't understand it that way. Pretty soon reports began to reach General Funston from refugees that after passing through the hands of scores of Mexican officials on the way from Mexico City, the first dictatorial and unpleasant officer they met was the lieutenant in charge of the club train. The lieutenant kept his dignity all right, but by orders of General Funston, who acts like lightning in such cases, he lost his job on the train. There's a soldier chap on the train now who helps the arriving refugees to cheer for the Red, White and Blue, if they want to, and who only smiles, happily, if an enthusiastic American slips him between the shoulders and says "You fellows are all right."

Even Rear Admiral Sir Craddock, who has charge of the two English ships in the harbor, and who outranks Badger, Fletcher, Mayo and Winslow, has had his troubles, though he took them gamely and with a smile. He walked in "civvy" clothes to an American marine outpost on the beach the other day, and was stopped by a sentry, who said:

"What's your name?"

"Craddock," answered the stranger.

"Well, this is the deadline," said the sentry, not knowing he was speaking to the British admiral, "you can't go any further."

"I don't want to go any further, then," said the admiral, and he turned, smiling, and strode away.

Williamette Pacific tracks are to reach tidewater by October 1. In all 1,500 men are employed.
