OPTIMISM REGARDING FUTURE

THE first step toward success is believing in success. No community can be built up to a place of prominence unless its citizens have confidence in its future.

Confidence is contagious, and, however optimistic a few citizens may be, until their optimism has been communicated to those about them it has not reached its greatest effectiveness. Optimism is a great personal resource for any man. The same optimism, if injected into the affairs of a community, will make its progress rapid and its success secure.

It has frequently been said that the whole of the Pacific Coast population is dominated by optimism, and that the marvelous success of that region has been due to the optimism that pervades its people.

Every citizen of a Pacific Coast community believes that he is the best community on the coast, and he believes, also, that the coast, as a whole, is little short of a paradise on earth.

Everybody who has visited the West and the coast especially is impressed with the hopefulness and the confidence that possesses everybody in this section. There are other sections and there are many individual communities in which the fire of hope for the future always burns in the brightest flame, and in all such sections and communities progress is rapid, improvement is the order of the day, and success after success is achieved with apparent spontaneity.

No wonder Klamath is destined to go ahead. In addition to our natural resources, boundless in their extent, we are receiving great aid from other sources—and can attract still more by making more manifest our own confidence in our country.

The salesman who has not entire confidence in the merits of the commodity he seeks to dispose of has difficulty in his work. The community where people are imbued with the knowledge that in it or near it there is everything needed to make it forge ahead, will progress.

And what community is more happily blessed in this respect than Klamath Falls, with its timber, its farming possibilities, its irrigation system, its water power prospects, and other still undeveloped resources? We know all this—why not let others know?
