What the War Moves Mean

By J. W. T. MASON (Staff Correspondent United Press)

NEW YORK, Aug. 14.—For the first time since the present eastern offensive campaign was started, the official statements from Berlin announce the part that Field Marshal von Hindenburg is playing. It is known today that he is in command of the operations on the Baltic, and is checking the advances of the Russians during the last few days along the Riga-Nitau road. Simultaneously, perhaps ominously, the Novos Vremya Petrograd's leading newspaper, is reported to have warned the people of Russia that German's real objective is the city of Petrograd.

Where von Hindenburg is, must center the climax of the struggle to force the Slavs to sue for a separate peace.

The campaign on the Baltic has been clothed with the elements of mystery from the beginning. Only the bare announcements of occasional progress has been contained in the official communique. The number of men engaged has been kept secret. It is assumed that the purpose of the Baltic offensive is to cut to the Warsaw-Petrograd railroad in an attempt to drive the Russian forces southward into the arms of Field Marshal von Mackensen's armies along the Vistula. But the annihilation of the Russian field forces, perhaps, is not the major objective after all. The immense difficulty of such a task has perhaps caused the abandonment of such a plan, if it was really ever contemplated.

Instead of expending strength in trying to envelop the Russian forces, the Teutons may intend to isolate Petrograd by blocking the armies in Central and Southern Russia. Then von Hindenburg could march on to Petrograd and compel the czar and his court to flee for safety.

Because Napoleon could not hold Moscow is no reason why the Germans, once in Petrograd, could not cling on indefinitely. The Novos Vremya estimates that the present Teutonic power is seven times as great as Napoleon's. Whether Russia has increased her strength seven fold remains to be proved.
