FIRE LOSS AND PREVENTION

IF THROUGH the publication and distribution of this little pamphlet, the home or business house of an innocent citizen or a single human life shall have been saved, I shall rest content that its purpose has been served," says Insurance Commissioner Harvey Wells, in conclusion of his letter of introduction contained in his "Fire Prevention Bulletin," which is now off the press and ready for free distribution upon application to his department.

Statistics compiled from the reports of insurance companies to Insurance Commissioner Wells for the year 1914, as well as data covering conditions generally throughout the country, reveal an alarming record of fire losses, a large percentage of which is due to carelessness or thoughtlessness, either on the part of the property owner or the tenant. In his "Fire Prevention Bulletin" Commissioner Wells calls attention to a long list of the multitude of causes of fire losses in the home and business house, and points out how, by the exercise of a little foresight and discretion, very much, if not all, of this needless waste of property and precious human lives may be prevented.

Mr. Wells suggests, also, as a most effective means of reducing the excessive and needless fire loss in the state, the establishment of a department of "Fire Preventers," and the enactment and rigid enforcement of a fire marshal law.

Among the many chief causes of fire waste treated of in the bulletin are: Matches, rubbish and trash, ashes, refuse and debris in attics, cellars and closets; kerosene, gasoline, spontaneous combustion and its causes, bonfires, rats and matches (being an expose of the threadbare fallacy), growing grain fires, lumberyard fires, electricity, Fourth of July follies and excesses, danger from Christmas trees, etc.

Numerous subjects of an instructive nature, such as: Fighting fire in the home; how to turn in a fire alarm; fire drills and suggestions for fire drills in schools; a modern fire chief, firemen should inspect; first aid to the burned, over-insurance and arson; facts concerning the origin of fires (over 100 of them), and a long list of "don't's" in their relation to fire prevention, with extra precautions to be observed "when in the woods," are covered in lucid and instructive form in the pamphlet.
