BOOK CLUBS AS LIBRARY AIDS

THE modern tendency of public libraries is to extend their influence beyond their walls by means of branches and reading courses. But at best much remains to be done in interesting the whole people in the treasures of wisdom locked up within the volumes of their libraries. There must be some work done outside, by the people themselves. The work must come from within the person who is to be benefited by it. Education of the sort that results from reading good books is not accomplished through the aid of teachers, beyond the developing of a taste for such reading, and it not infrequently happens that the worker in the fields of education as in other fields, has little real love for his work; consequently he can not be expected to inspire a love for books if he has little love for them himself.

Love for anything follows from the experiencing of pleasure in connection with it. Persons who read the popular novels only can hardly be said to be book lovers in the same sense that some of our greatest men and women have been. Reading of that sort in many cases hardly ranks above cigarette smoking, though there are many wise men who read popular novels and smoke cigarettes while doing so. A taste for good literature is a means of educating one's self and of enlarging one's mental world, as well as being a solace in sickness, adversity and old age; but it is a taste that must be acquired usually before sickness, old age or adversity overtakes. Books afford the means of becoming acquainted with the great spirits of all times, and by means of the printed page those of us unworthy of touching the garments of great men and women may nevertheless be taken into their most intimate confidences through their writings.

The associations that come about in this way are inspiring to the young, especially, and the greatness of soul depicted in the character of good books affords the greatest stimulus for emulation that can be made readily available to the youth of isolated communities. Unquestionably to have come into intimate personal relations with a Washington or a Lincoln would in itself have been an inspiration to the most inferior of men; coming into the sphere in which the great men of all ages lived and worked is possible to us nowadays only through the medium of books—a medium that if properly utilized may be very inspiring indeed.

Education, instead of stopping at the school house doors, begins with adopting life's vocation. The taste for study should have been created in school; the pursuit of knowledge should be continued throughout life. Hence book clubs, literary societies and similar organizations designed to make the learning of books accessible to all are worthy institutions that may be made to rank little below schools.

Shields Woman Accused in Divorce

MRS. ELSIE HOLMES VOLCK AND HER CHILDREN

Mrs. Elsie Holmes Volck, well known to society in New York and several other cities, refuses to give the name of the woman she accuses as correspondent in the divorce action she has brought against her husband. Mrs. Volck's lawyer said the woman in the case was of such social prominence that it was not desired to do her an injury. Mr. Volck's mother, with whom he now makes his home, is the wife of Brazilian Ambassador Da Gama. Her marriage was performed by the late Mayor Gaynor of New York in the home of Elbert H. Bridges Are Blown Up and Roads and Are Mined on Retreat to Salonika

By WM. G. SHEPHERD
(United Press Staff Correspondent)

Salonika, Dec. 11.—Where the huge French camp had been the night before, all was bare before morning. Smoking chimneys, here and there, showed the four o'clock coffee had been made, but the removal of the camp had begun at three o'clock in the morning, and by the time the newspapersmen arose from their cots in the hospital tent and went outdoors to wash their faces in pails of cold water, the French soldiers were several miles down the valley road, their wagons loaded with camp equipment.

There were explosions across the river, where a military road had been cut along the face of the river embankment.

"Artillery?" I asked a captain.

"Blasting," he explained. "Blowing up the wagon road."

"They take us to Krivolak today, don't they?" asked a French reporter.

"No, they don't," he said, significantly.

"But three days ago General Sarraill said we were to be taken to Krivolak."

"But three days ago isn't today," said the officer. "See all these soldiers marching along the railroad. Well, they have come from Krivolak, and I am not supposed to tell you, but the fact is we're evacuating Krivolak and the Bulgarians are probably in it by this time."

Later developments showed that his guess was a good one. At the very time we were talking of Krivolak, the Bulgarian cavalry was marching into the place.

We heard no more artillery fire around Strumitsa. The cannon had been dragged down from the nearby hills and were being loaded on flat cars, while we had breakfast in the railroad station. It was noon when our military guide led us to a box car in a freight train and told us to climb in.

We were starting back to the Greek border. Not a single venturesome newspaperman begged to stay. In our train were box cars loaded with twelve Serbian soldiers, with Serbian civilians who were carrying with them their household effects that they had been able to transport by hand, with French soldiers whose feet were wrapped in heavy packing, victims of frostbite. There were also flat cars carrying cannon, hay, and wood, and cars with high walls above which appeared the heads of tightly packed horses.

We were beating it, with the French, from Serbia in a retreat that will perhaps be considered one of the most dramatic events in the history of the war.

The two engines snorted for a minute or two and finally got the long string of cars under way. We rolled slowly over the Vardar bridge, which was blown up two days later, and saw, amid the girders the ends of the long fuses which were to be lighted at the last possible moment.

The wagon road to the Greek border ran parallel to the railroad for many miles and we overtook many wagon trains. A French aeroplane soared above us once, heading toward Krivolak. In the mountains we could hear artillery booming and once or twice we saw the flash of the guns. These big guns must keep talking loudly and busily to prevent the Bulgars from knowing a retreat was under way. It was these guns in the mountains which the British communication referred to when it was "we lost eight cannon." The British artillerymen stuck to them to the last minute.

By night we were back in Salonika.

ENGLAND FEARS WAR MAY WIPE OUT PEERAGE; PLANS ACTION

By WILBUR S. FORREST
(United Press Staff Correspondent)

LONDON, Jan. 8.—(By mail)—A proposal is being considered in the highest quarters to provide against the extinction of British peerages by the operations of the war. One peer without an heir, Lord Keaton, already has been killed in action and several heirs to peerages, including those of Lord Lincolnshire and Lord Ribblesdale, have fallen, leaving no heirs to succeed them. It is considered possible that steps soon will be taken to create "special remainders" for succession of titles from the female side. Six titles have become extinct so far during the war. At the beginning of 1915, there were 681 hereditary peers in the United Kingdom.
