Moving Pictures

The great personal and artistic success attained by Violet Mersereau when she first appeared as a star in Bluebird photoplays assures an enthusiastic welcome for "Broken Fetters," the sensational Bluebird feature in which she will appear at the Gipsy theater on Sunday and Monday, with William Girwood leading a strong supporting company. Miss Mersereau added immeasurably to her laurels through her appearance in "The Great Problem" a few weeks ago, and there is abundant promise that her work in "Broken Fetters" will still further enhance her popularity with devotees of the photoplay. Not alone is the story of the play immensely engaging, but Rex Ingram, who directed the production, has embellished the scenes with an atmosphere of beauty that would alone make the feature exceptional among modern presentations on the screen. Oriental splendors are reflected in brilliant scenes; the Far East meets the commercial atmosphere of New York, and the blend results in an entertainment unusual in every particular. Miss Mersereau plays the role of an American girl, raised from infancy in China, and brought to her native country in bondage. She is taken to New York's Chinatown, where her liberty is obtained under sensational circumstances. Throughout the various and varied scenes and incidents there is the thread of an inspiring love story to hold the "heart interest" intense, while the sensations pass in rapid sequences.

rich. During his absence Madge gives birth to a son. Owing to the fact that she is without funds, she is cared for during this period by Crewe, although she does not know it. When Dan returns he finds his wife changed from a cheerful, normal woman to a miser—this being the physiological effect on her of the horrible poverty she has undergone before the birth of her child. Although he now has money, she refuses to dress decently, live in a decent home, or part with her hoarded pennies. In trying to understand the cause of this change, Dan stumbles upon the fact that Crewe not only supported Madge at the hospital, but that she had paid him back money he had lent her. This leads to suspicion—eventually to a tremendous quarrel and a parting between husband and wife, and their happiness is only saved by Crewe coming forward and confessing his part in their affairs. This six reel Lubin production at the Star tonight. Tomorrow night the Ragamuffin, featuring Blanche Sweet.
