You Never Miss the Water

South America is Sitting on a Powder Magazine

By CHARLES P. STEWART
(United Press Staff Correspondent)

Colombia, Argentina, Peru and Bolivia are four South American republics in- cluding the richest and most productive areas of the world, which are also situated in the southern part of South America. The rich and fertile lands of these republics provide an abundance of minerals, particularly gold and silver. In addition, they also produce coffee, coca, rubber, and other valuable commodities.

The situation in South America is quite serious, as the United States is concerned. There has been a rapid increase in the production of these minerals in recent years, which has created a surplus on the world market. This has led to a decline in prices, which has affected the economy of the producing countries.

The United States is highly dependent on these minerals, as they are used in various industries, such as electronics, automobiles, and construction. Therefore, it is crucial to maintain a steady supply of these minerals to ensure the continued growth of the economy.

To address this issue, the United States has been engaging in discussions with the governments of these countries to find a solution. This includes offering incentives for increased production and establishing long-term contracts for the purchase of these minerals.

In conclusion, the situation in South America is quite serious, and it is crucial for the United States to take action to ensure a steady supply of these minerals. The United States should continue to engage in discussions with these countries to find a solution that benefits both parties.