Miss Florence Short of Fort Klamath, and Mrs. T. N. Case and Mrs. McCombs of this district spent the afternoon Tuesday with Mrs. John Kautz.

Last Friday the first month of school was finished. Everything is running well, except the broom; we need a new one.

CAN'T BUY CIGARETTES ON CAMPUS AT OREGON

EUGENE, Oct. 5.—Cigarettes are not sold at the new co-operative store of the University of Oregon students, although the store is not on University property. The student directors have decided temporarily against cigarettes, and the injunction is likely to stand.

The law students also have an unwritten law against smoking of any kind on the campus.

Nothing smarter or finer in quality can be found on Fifth avenue than some of the new arrivals at Gertrude & Co. The only difference is they are not priced nearly so high.

The Life of a Watch

DEPENDS on the care it gets.

You may never drop it, jar it, or injure it in any other way, but it will still need the attention of a repairer every 12 to 15 months because age dries up the oil, friction results, and that means injury to the delicate bearings—permanent injury if you wait too long.

It's always economy to have watch cleaning and repairing done at Upp's because you get perfect work, fully guaranteed, at the lowest price for which such work can possibly be done.

WOULD RESUME SUBMARINING

VON TIRPITZ PARTY IN GERMAN WOULD FORCE, IF POSSIBLE, RESUMPTION OF WARFARE OBJECTED TO BY WILSON

By CARL W. ACKERMAN
(United Press Staff Correspondent)

BERLIN, Oct. 5.—Efforts of the von Tirpitz party to force a resumption of submarine warfare will be defeated as the result of the conference now being held in secret sessions of the reichstag committee, it is now generally believed.

The Tirpitzites, however, hope to force a public discussion of the whole question when the reichstag reconvenes Thursday.

Ernest Basserman, gray haired national liberal party leader, and one of the most important figures in the reichstag, declared today after the question has been aired in the budget committee meetings, it will be fully discussed in open session.

"We wish to live in peace and friendship with America," said Basserman, "but undoubtedly there is bitter feeling here because American supplies of ammunition enable our enemies to continue the war."

"If America should succeed in forcing England to obey international law, restore freedom of the seas and proceed with American energy against England's brutalization of neutrals, it would have a decisive influence on the political situation between the two countries."

"Do you think submarine warfare will be renewed?" he was asked.

"That must be decided by the foreign office, the ministry of marine and the general staff," was the reply. "England is our chief enemy. We must recognize this, and defeat her."

Czar of All the Russias Puts in Long, Hard Days

By WILLIAM PHILIP SIMMS
(United Press Staff Correspondent)

IMPERIAL HEADQUARTERS, RUSSIAN ARMY, Sept. 4.—By mail.

—Czar Nicholas, ruler of Russia's millions and commander in chief of her armies, works harder than any millionaire in Wall street. He puts in more hours a day than American trade unions allow by just about as much again. And he lies down to sleep at night on a folding camp bed, hard and springless, made of canvas.

The emperor was on his way to work, walking through the rain, when I saw him. He looks like his pictures except that he is quite brown from living much in the open. He walks with an athletic swing. Life at the front seems to agree with him.

Every soldier within view stood at rigid salute as he appeared in the doorway of the rather modest two-story house where he had his quarters. The czar responded. Stepping forward a few paces, he shook hands with one of his officers, and despite the drizzle, stood in the open door about half a minute talking. He wore neither overcoat nor waterproof, being dressed simply in the regulation khaki and black boots. He hurried on through the rain to the offices of the general staff, a hundred yards away, followed by two aides de camp and Joy, the 13-year-old crown prince's mongrel, which, not being interested in his master's English lesson going on inside, had come out to share honors with the imperial suite.

In a minute the czar, in a room on the second floor of the staff headquarters, had settled down to work. General Michel Alexieff, chief of staff, was making his daily report and getting his orders.

Nicholas II. rises shortly after 8 o'clock. At 9 he sits down to eggs, rolls and coffee. At 10 o'clock he goes to staff headquarters and receives General Alexieff's report, illustrated by maps and charts. By 12:30 p. m., the report is finished, and the emperor's orders for generals along the entire front are sent out by telegraph from an adjoining room.

The czar eats lunch at his own quarters. A taste of l'ordre-d'oeuvre, an omelette, a meat, dessert and coffee form his usual meal at this time of day, with a cigarette after the coffee. He does not smoke cigars. At lunch are the crown prince, two aides, the governor of the palace, a court functionary, the imperial physician and usually a few guests, visiting allied generals, Russian generals at headquarters for the day, a minister from Petrograd perhaps, and rarely General Alexieff. This busy man does not feel he can spare an hour and a half a day over lunch.

About 3 o'clock the czar motors to the country with the crown prince, the crown prince's dog and usually two youngsters, pals of the future Emperor of Russia, chosen by himself from among the ordinary boys living near headquarters.

Once the town is left behind the emperor gets out and walks, doing about five miles at a brisk pace. Some times he gets into an ordinary row boat and pulls the oars himself. As Derewenco, a giant sailor friend of the czar to the throne, is not infrequently a member of the party, it sometimes happens that an ordinary jack tar has the experience of being rowed by the czar. Spading sand along the river bank is another form of exercise sometimes enjoyed by the emperor.

Six o'clock finds the imperial commander in chief back at headquarters.

Come in and look them over today, or any other day. We'll be glad to show them to you.

He has had his exercises, and now goes back to work. Generals from the front make their reports at this time of day, and if there is to be a general military council, it is now that it takes place.

Ministers from Petrograd also report and receive their instructions at this time.

Dinner at 3. About the same people present. There is soup, fish, two meat dishes, salad, dessert and coffee. There is no vodka.

After dinner the emperor retires to his private apartment. The crown prince is put to bed, where he never fails to get his good night kiss from his emperor-father. The czar then sits in his study, going over the ministerial reports which arrive daily from Petrograd. He keeps at his desk until long after midnight, only stopping at about 11 o'clock for a glass or two of tea.

Nothing could be plainer than the czar's bed chamber, where he and his son sleep. Between the two beds, against the wall, is a small night table, and upon this are small frames, holding photographs of various members of the imperial family. On the wall, over the table, are two or three more photographs and a couple of ikons. A few arm chairs, a small carved bookcase and a musical instrument, half mandolin, half guitar, the property of the crown prince, are the other furnishings. The floor is carpeted. In cold weather the room is heated by a fireplace with the great white-tiled box-like stove arrangement built in Russian style above it. The lighting is by electricity.

The emperor lives in the house of the district governor, but he has but two rooms to himself—his study and the bedroom which he shares with his heir.

Since assuming command of the army the czar has visited and reviewed every corps from one end of the front to the other. He goes to church every holiday, and since there are more than 100 holidays in the Russian year, he is at church at least once every three days.

Moving Pictures

Douglas Fairbanks and Selma Owen will appear at the Star tonight in a Triangle production entitled "The Lamb," a Griffith production, in five reels. Also a Kay-Bee comedy, "My Valet," in two reels, featuring Mack Bennett and Mable Normand, will be shown.

Flora Parked DeHaven, the bewitching star of the stage and screen, will be shown in a wonderful dramatization of Olga Printslau's well known story, "The Seekers," at the Orpheus theater Thursday and Friday. This is a Red Feather photograph in five reels, and according to the high standards set by these plays, they are sure to please the patrons.
