SCENE OF MARNE BATTLE SACRED

FRENCH MAY SET ASIDE AS A SACRED FOREST THE GROUND WHERE FRANCE TURNED BACK THE INVADING TEUTONS.

By HENRY WOOD (United Press Staff Correspondent)

VERDUN, Nov. 13.—(By Mail). With the close of the war the entire line of trenches in France, extending from Alsace to the Belgian border, may be converted into a sort of national sacred forest, as a permanent tribute to the memory of the French "poilus" who died there defending their national soil. A proposition to this effect has just been prepared by the general council of the department of the Meuse and will soon be submitted to the French government. The plan is to buy the battle-ground from the farmers. Should this plan be finally accepted, future generations not only of France but of the entire world would always have the opportunity of visiting the line of trenches over 600 kilometers in length on which the French threw back the tide of German invasion at the battle of the Marne and which till the end of the war will always remain the scene of France's military effort to rid her soil entirely of the enemy. The immediate land through which these long lines of trenches run, together with the battlefields of the Somme, of Arras and of Champagne will, it is believed, never again be rendered cultivable. Aside from the deep trenches and basins, the ground has been so pitted with shell holes to a depth varying from a few to 45 feet, and all the upper strata of soil on which fertility depends is completely wiped out, that little if any use could ever be made of the ground for agricultural purposes for years to come.
