Moving Pictures

Pretty little Dorothy Phillips, who is featured in the latest Red Feather five-reel production, "If My Country Should Call," in a recent interview gave away one of the secrets of all actresses. When asked how she produces tears when the scenario calls for them, Miss Phillips very reluctantly said that she had a method all her own.

Before she was in the movies Dorothy was on the legitimate stage and there the words that she had to speak helped put her in the proper moods. But in the movies there are no words, at least none furnished so she had to make up her own. She says that when she has to weep in a part, she quotes to herself a little poem that she has loved ever since she was a child. The words are so lovely that they would make anyone cry, but for her they have associations that never fail to bring tears to her eyes. But in spite of the fact that she was coaxed, she refused to divulge the name of her particular poem. "It would do you no good," she said, "for if you ever want to try it you must have something that has just as much meaning to you as my special charm has for me."

On Thursday and Friday evenings at the Orpheus theater there will be an opportunity to see Miss Phillips' plan in action, as she will be seen at that time in "If My Country Should Call."
