Farther afield, the situation in Rumania, where calmness had been recorded for some months, appears to have become more agitated.

The Allied troops have been displaying marked activity in local actions, which generally have been crowned with success. In this locality the Germans are now scarcely represented except on the army staffs, and the task of defending the front has been left to the Bulgarians alone. Their army is numerous and well trained, but shows no sign for the present of taking the offensive.

Most of the Turkish troops are engaged on the Persian and Palestine fronts, where they have suffered severe reverses at the hands of the British. A very small force of German troops is dispersed among their divisions, where they act as specialists, such as machine gunners and grenadiers.
