WATER

Just a few years ago the City of Klamath Falls was "Up against it." Perhaps there wasn't one person in five hundred knew it, but, nevertheless, it was a fact.

The situation was critical, the future of the City hung in the balance. Few realized, busy in their everyday affairs, that the Queen City of Southern Oregon, standing as she does on the banks of a great river and touching with her boundaries two great lakes, was famished for water.

There was "Water, water everywhere, but not a drop to drink; "it was starvation in a land of plenty, for the water of these big lakes and in the river was tule soaked and germ contained.

The only available supply was being pumped from an open spring into distributing reservoirs, but the quality was questioned and the supply inadequate.

Something had to be done; something was done! And today the City of Klamath Falls is possessed of an abundant supply of the purest artesian water in the world.

Three 12-inch wells were driled through hard rock, one to a depth of 78 feet, one to 80 feet and one to 160 feet, from which pure, cold, clear water gushed. These wells were cased, capped used in the City today is being pumped-water free from contamination of any kind, for it does not see the light of day until and sealed, and it is from these rock covered strata that the water it pours into the reservoir, and then only until it again runs away into the mains to serve you at the faucet.
