OLD PLYMOUTH HAS GROWN BIG

PLYMOUTH, Nov. 18—(By Mail) Plymouth, from whence may come England's first woman M. P., today is not the little seaport town which the Mayflower left. It is still a seaport, shipping and fishing being the principal sources of revenue, but it is also one of England's most flourishing seaports, boasting of a population of about 200,000.

Despite the city's prosperity and maritime importance, there are many of its customs which have remained unchanged through the three centuries since the Pilgrims waved their farewells.

American blue jackets have dubbed the town as "a nine o'clock town" for at that hour each evening the streets are practically deserted. Blinds are drawn, taxicabs are unavailable and night clerks in the hotels have settled themselves comfortably for the night's slumber behind their desks.

But if it is a nine o'clock town in the evenings, it is certainly "a six o'clock town" in the mornings for that time sees the majority of the people setting about their day's tasks, the fish market and dockyards are in full operation, the shopping districts beginning to open and the streets are lively.

Famous as a departing point for the Pilgrims and more recently by the arrival there of the N. C. 4 after her flight across the Atlantic, it is appropriate that Plymouth should again get her name into history thru sponsoring the feminine invasion of the Commons, commented one of Lady Astor's Unionist supporters.
