AT THE THEATERS

"Women between the ages of seventeen and thirty-five years are declared to be the property of the state for the use of its citizens."

So read the decree nationalizing women issued from the anarchist headquarters of the Russian village of Saratov. It was this decree that confronted Pavel Pavlovitch, a Russian with an American wife and a beautiful daughter.

It seemed inevitable that his wife and daughter should register for the use of any male citizen of the Black Empire who took out a certificate stating his desire to claim a woman of the state.

At a moment when their fate seemed worse than death a strange thing occurred. The son of the village priest claimed the daughter and an old peasant, who had been in the service of Pavlovitch for years claimed the wife.

These are the complications on which is based the story of "Common Property," a new Universal production, which will be shown at the Liberty Theatre tonight, with Robert Andersen in the leading role. It tells vividly the horrors of a pernicious piece of soviet jurisprudence.

The many marvelous settings in Geraldine Farrar's latest Goldwyn picture, "Flame of the Desert," are exact replicas of the originals. The scenes are laid in Egypt and no expense or trouble has been spared to make the backgrounds true to characteristic scenes in this interesting north African land.

A lengthy Cairo street was erected with typical shops, banks, public buildings and the attractive terrace of the Cairo Hotel. Dragomen pass up and down the street, native water sellers, pack camels and donkeys and low carriages carrying tourists. The open street shops are full of handsome rugs and tapestries and native lamps and vases are arranged in tiers near the sidewalk. Just as these goods are displayed in Egypt.

In the annual religious procession formed for the worship of the Holy Mahmal or carpet on its journey to Mecca, there are English soldiers flying dervishes on mounted platforms, elephants, camels and other native animals and some nine hundred real Hindoos and Arabs who were gathered from Los Angeles and the surrounding country to take part in the picture. Lieut. Colonel Gordon McGee, a well known English army officer, superintended the military maneuvers of the troops. In the picture and also advised as to how the interior settings of the English officers' Cairo Club should be planned. He also described in detail the great Victory Ball, given in London in celebration of the signing of the armistice. This great social function with its preponderance of military uniforms from almost every known country in the world, appears on the screen just as it was given in the English capital. Perhaps the most remarkable views of the entire picture are the desert scenes. A great stretch of California beach land was used for these locations, and pyramids, desert palms and rolling sand dunes give wonderful effects, which it is almost impossible
