Independence Day Should Be More Than a "Picnic"

You're going to have a good time on "the Fourth;" it's the thing to do. But you ought to stop a few minutes to think of the men who gave their lives in order that the United States might be a free and independent nation.

EVERY ONE OF US CAN PUT SOMETHING OF THEIR SPIRIT INTO BUSINESS AND SOCIAL LIFE; WE CAN ALL THINK MORE OF THE RIGHTS OF OTHERS, AND LEND A HELPING HAND MORE OFTEN THAN WE DO. IT'S SOMETHING TO THINK ABOUT.

PELICAN MOURNS IKE'S MISFORTUNE

"B'pose you're tickled to death that Ike is out a cold fifty dollars because he's too intelligent to read your blithering rag," commented the Old Pelican, as he wandered casually into the muse's temple and glanced about in search of a resting place.

"Your supposition is interesting," we averred coldly, "but in the first place you have an advantage in your familiar use of some citizen's Christian name, and your further discourse regarding his pecuniary misfortunes, and the bearing thereupon of his habit of literary selection, is utterly unintelligible, and, we might add, immaterial, inasmuch as our attend is regularly forthcoming regardless of the quantity of papers sold. Quality is the acid test of our endeavors," we finished grandly. "If you, perchance, can furnish a subscriber, the circulation department will gladly receive the information, but as for us—"

"Hey Rube! Bring up the first aid kit!" gasped the ancient one, as he climbed upon the rim of the waste basket and swayed dizzily. "Next to sitting through one of those city council sessions, where Ike comes across with an explanation of how hard he has to work for his meager salary, I haven't run into such a gas attack since I was B company's mascot in the Argonne. Calm yourself, Buddy. As Ike says—'Now, it's just like this'—"

"Ike, Ike!" we snapped irascibly. "How the devil should I know your friend Ike?"

"Just so, just so," responded the visitor, "how should you, seeing as Ike let's his light shine under a bushel basket, and don't advertise in your paper?" Here the Old Pelican paused to polish a toenail reflectively with his bill.

"Darn if I don't hate to waste this yarn on you," he continued, "but it's too good to keep. You see, Ike was down in Mills addition the other day, working hard as usual, and he was too busy to notice when his fifty dollar charm dropped off his watch chain."

"Course, being a man of sense, Ike knew better than to put a two-bit ad. in your paper, even if he'd been inclined to let you get suddenly rich at his expense. John Floden came along and picked up Ike's jewelry. John makes a lot of money driving a jitney, so he was reckless and spent a quarter on a 'found' ad."

"And so your friend 'Ike' recovered his trinket," we remarked. "That is a happy state of affairs."

"If you could market all the ivory that you carry north of your collar button, you'd be a millionaire," he retorted. "I told you to start with, that Ike has too much intelligence to take your bloom'n' rag. You don't work any get-rich-quick schemes on Ike. Of course, if he won't read the paper, he won't see the ad, and he'll never find out John picked up his Knights Templar charm."

"Some one should tell him," we made brilliant suggestion. "But you have not yet revealed the identity of your friend 'Ike.'"

"I ain't got time today, son," said the Old Pelican, as he feasted his left wing preparatory to flight, "guess you'll have to pass it along as it is." And off he shot leaving us seriously bewildered.
