TEETH'S BIG FOE

Pyorrhea Responsible for Immense Amount of Suffering.

Infection of the Gums Which Frequently is Not Suspected Until Much Harm Has Been Done—
How to Recognize It.

(Supplied by the United States Public Health Service, Washington, D. C.)

Pyorrhea is an infection of the gums or tooth-sockets. It begins beneath the edges of the gums that have been injured and especially where there has been an accumulation of tartar or lime-deposit. As the infection progresses and destroys the membranes that attach the root of the tooth to the socket, a pocket is formed around the root and the tooth becomes loosened. It is said that this disease is responsible for far more loss of teeth than is decay.

But this is not the only evil. In the pocket pus is continually being formed and discharged into the mouth and swallowed. Also, as the teeth rise and fall in their diseased sockets in ordinary chewing, bacteria are forced into the circulation and may be carried to distant parts, where they work harm according to their nature, selecting tissues for their operation in which they can best thrive.

It was formerly supposed that the ill effects from such conditions as dental abscess and other pus foci were wholly due to the toxins or poisonous products thrown into the blood-stream by the bacteria at the focus. It is now known, however, that the bacteria migrate into outside tissues through the blood and lymph-streams. In joint affections they clog and obstruct the small blood-vessels, interfering with the nutrition of the joint-tissues, causing deformity and enlargement, as in arthritis deformans, as well as in acute inflammation, such as rheumatic fever. Indeed, this condition of sub-infection, or "focal infection," is coming to be recognized as a far more important cause of disease than the time-honored auto-intoxication, a term which has been greatly abused and misused.

Wanted an Audience.

During my vacation I started in a canoe one afternoon on a four-mile trip across the lake. There had been a hard storm the night before, and the lake was quite rough. The wind carried me out of my course, the canoe dipped water with every roller, and I was soaked and terrified. When I reached the opposite side I decided that I would never go back until something more substantial should come along and pick me up.

An hour later one of the finest speed boats on the lake docked at the wharf. I boldly asked the pilot to take me back to the hotel. On the return trip I entertained him with a gay line of chatter, and as we came near the hotel I noticed that there were very few guests out, and asked him if he would mind going on a little further, coming back when there was more of an audience to appreciate my impressive home coming. When I finally did get out of his boat I offered him the 40 cents, which is the usual fee for hired boat service on the lake. The most embarrassing moment of my life came when the guests excitedly informed me that I had been riding with one of the most important and dignified political figures of the day, who had a summer estate nearby.—Exchange.
