The Spark Plug

In which we tell of the big men and the little things we find in Gasoline Alley

HE RE-TIRES BUT NEVER TIRED

Three and one-half years old and still growing. That partly tells the story of Charley's Place, located at the corner of Sixth and Klamath, and which, since its establishment, has been conducted by rotund, genial Charles B. Johnson.

Charley, as he is popularly known by almost everybody in this city and surrounding country, dropped into town from some place down in Southern California. It doesn't matter much where he came from, except that any place which can produce men of Charley's calibre can't be such a bad place in which to live after all.

At any rate, Charley dropped into town from some place in California and went to work in the Howie garage. After being employed there about a year he decided to embark on the stormy seas of business life in his own boat, and after a successful departure, he has been sailing the same seas with an abundance of success ever since. However, after making the best of cramped quarters in the building now occupied by Dick Murdoch's Old Curiosity shop, he secured the building across the street, and that's just where you will find Charley today.

He remodeled the place, stocked the basement with oils, tires, things like that, and then proceeded to install which he considers, and what everybody acquainted with it will concede, is one of the best equipped repair shops in the Pacific Northwest. Just now Charley is installing an air compressor which is guaranteed to force 10 cubic feet of air a minute. He can repair pneumatic tires of any description, and more than that he wants to impress the public with the fact that when he repairs anything it goes out of his shop with the stamp of a real repair job upon it.

Flak and Lee puncture proof tires are Charley's biggest stock in trade, but he also sells lugs and rim parts for any make of car, Monogram and Mobile A oil, Zerolene, and gasoline which, to save his life, he can't afford to sell for a bit less than 38 cents a gallon. This, said, Charley, is his one big grief—he'd like to sell it for less, but freight rates and other obstacles seem to have entered into a conspiracy to cause him to grieve his life away. Nothing but a drop in the price of gas can assuage this grief.

Incidentally, Charley is unmarried, but he says he has no objections to engaging in a life of conjugal felicity, or infelicity, provided the right sort of woman with the right sort of nerve, comes along and advances the proposition.
