Broken, but Confident

Dennis Morgan, mayor of Thules, is a short, slender, haggard man, with a mass of black hair, who resembles Edgar Allen Poe. Lines upon his face are eloquent of anxiety and grief. His only son died of heart failure during a raid upon their home. Morgan himself has been hunted from place to place in Ireland since last January. Nevertheless, he is confident Ireland soon will be free.

"While I was in jail last March," said Morgan, "the police raided the home of a man named McCarthy in Thules at midnight. As he opened the door his younger brother, James McCarthy, was shot dead by four black and tans. Several shots were fired at his sister as she fled down the streets in her night clothes in search of a doctor.

Man, 60, Shot at Wake

"In the little village of Holy Cross, two months ago, a harmless 60-year-old man was shot down as he left a house in which a wake was being held over the body of a girl. The house of death was then riddled with bullets."

One of the most striking narratives was that of M. M. English, an American citizen of White Hall, Mont., who was visiting his parents in Cove, Ireland, when a typical raid took place.

He is a broad-shouldered, black-haired man, more than six feet tall, and as he talked his voice trembled with rage and indignation.

His testimony was unraveled under questions from Senator Walsh of Massachusetts, a member of the committee.

U. S. Citizenship Flouted

"On August 29, the day before I sailed for America, a motor lorry filled with black and tan troops speeded up to my father's house and quickly surrounded it. They were commanded. I afterwards discovered by a Major Ray, assisted by Captain V. H. Wells.

"The commander knocked at the door with the butt of his pistol, and announced he intended to search every man on the premises. One of his first actions was to take my father's watch and laugh when he asked for its return.

"I protested against my baggage being searched on the ground that I am an American citizen.

"A lot of good that will do you," laughed the commander. "You are on English soil now."

"Where is your warrant?" I asked.

Pistol Is "Warrant."

"He tapped his pistol significantly. 'This is my warrant,' he said. 'Be careful, or you will get more of it.'"

"We were all searched, while soldiers stood about with fixed bayonets. Next the house was ransacked, carpets ripped up, backs torn off pictures, while the commander and his assistant carefully tapped both the floor and the walls in search of hidden depositories.

"In a wardrobe they found a card identifying my younger brother, Patrick English, as an Irish volunteer. The commander demanded to know his whereabouts, and when I refused to reply all my personal belongings, including my notes on a trip through Europe, England and Ireland, were confiscated.

"When they identified my brother, who was in the house, we were marched off under arrest, but later all but Patrick were released. My brother served six months in prison.

"A particularly brutal case was that of Patrick Lynch, a harness-maker, who lived with his sisters in a village near Cove. During evening prayers the door was forced open by a party of black and tans.

"Does a man named Lynch live here?" they asked, and when he replied 'yes' they said he was under arrest. He asked for time to get his cap.

"You won't need your cap where you're going," the soldiers replied.

Marred Past Identification

"Then they took him to the village green and fired a number of shots into his body. The village doctor, who examined the body, knew Lynch well, but was compelled to call his sisters to identify him, so disfigured was his face by powder burns.

"The black and tans, it developed, had heard that a man named Lynch had shot a policeman. They killed a perfectly innocent citizen by mistake.

"An official report from Dublin Castle declared Lynch had been killed resisting arrest and attempting to escape, but the coroner's jury placed the blame where it belonged, on the Irish constabulary."

MORE EXPENSE ACCOUNTS

Fred Peterson has filed his expense account covering his expenditures of the last campaign, $54.50 being the sum total. This was divided between advertising in the Klamath Record and The Evening Herald, and for cards.

G. K. Van Riper, re-elected county treasurer, has filed his statement, and it develops that his campaign cost him nothing. He had no opposition.

Sues to Recover Apples Attached With Store's Stock

S. E. Robinson has filed suit against Sheriff George Humphrey for the recovery of a quantity of apples said to have been included in the stock of the Ashland fruit store and the Palace grocery when they failed and their stocks were turned over to the sheriff to satisfy the indebtedness.

Robinson claims that the apples were sent to H. H. Jenkins, proprietor of the fruit store, on consignment, and that they cannot lawfully be included in the stock to be sold. The lot contains 273 boxes of fancy Spitsenbergs and probably 100 boxes of Baldwins, Shannons, Rhode Island Greenings and other kinds, the total value being about $1,000.
