THE FIRST STATE AND SAVINGS BANK

The First State and Savings bank has not failed, and we do not believe it will fail. The fact that the doors were closed today does not mean that they will not reopen.

Back of the closing lies a long, long story. Its telling at this time is neither opportune nor necessary. But it does not involve any men connected with the First State and Savings bank in any misconduct in the management of its affairs.

"I would rather go down to failure standing side by side with Captain Siemens, than to rise to fame by contributing one iota to the hardships now confronting him."

It is this confidence in the man that is going to put the First State and Savings bank back in its old place as one of the sound financial institutions of the state.

Its closing comes through no fault of Captain Siemens nor any of the officials. It comes simply as a result of an indefinable, untraceable rumor that all was not right with the institution.

Then came the failure of the Morris Brothers bonding house. This failure changed conditions in Portland to such an extent as to require the return of Captain Siemens to that city, where he was at the time it was decided to close the doors of the bank.

Another reason for confidence is the unequivocal statement of Mr. Hooper that the bank is solvent. Its closing will mean a little inconvenience to those having money on deposit, but that is all.

What will happen? Undoubtedly the usual custom will be followed. The bank will reorganize, the reserve placed where it will meet every demand and the institution resume operations.

and doing that which they should not do. But the very reverse was true. To the close observer nothing out of the ordinary could be discerned. Those who discussed the situation, manifested their confidence by the statement that the First State and Savings bank would reopen. And while the people have done only that which they should do, it is not at all out of place to tell them about it and to congratulate them upon their good, sound, solid common sense.
