America's policy toward Greece and the question of the $33,000,000 credit.

The docks, warehouses and customs house in Piraeus (the port of Athens) are choked with merchandise, due to the inability of the purchasers to pay for it. The same condition prevails at Saloniki, Smyrna and Constantinople. Orders have been cancelled by the wholesale.

Retail prices have increased to a point where they are prohibitory. Taxes are mounting. The government is faced with the necessity of issuing more paper money. Bank rates on short loans to stock exchange brokers range as high as 40 per cent. There is huge speculation in exchange, manipulators buying large amounts of foreign money on margin and then selling it at a profit.

Greece's public debt, including her share of the Ottoman debt prescribed by the Sevres treaty, is nearly 6,000,000,000 drachmae. (In normal times equivalent to about $1,200,000,000.) Her total national income is estimated at 5,000,000,000 drachmae. Her budget deficit for this year is 1,000,000,000 drachmae. Her issue of paper money is nearly 2,000,000,000 drachmae. Fortunately, this is largely covered by gold reserve and by securities in foreign countries. The state's indebtedness to the National bank doubled during the last year, amounting on January 1, 1921, to nearly 1,500,000,000 drachmae. The greater part of this money was used for Asia Minor campaign.

The defeat of Venizelos and the return of King Constantine has affected all business in a country where commerce and politics are closely associated. The blockade of foreign credits, the rapid decline in the drachma, and uncertainty as to the future has resulted in commercial paralysis.

Greece feels especially her inability to use the $33,000,000 credit she has in the United States. The American state department has made it clear that this cannot be touched until the question of recognition of the king is settled. Constantine insists he never abdicated, and refuses to recognize the legality of his son Alexander's reign. This attitude may have an important bearing upon
